Judging from interest Idaho students have shown in golf this spring, Fitzke's hunch may be right. The first warm days of spring found many students practicing shots on the campus. In addition to digging up numerous divots, they made it risky for one to walk across the campus. A university ruling sent them elsewhere.

TE GET AN idea in our conscious thoughts that a certain road is shorter than some other, and we let everybody in on the secret. Then sud-to believe, but facts are facts. One of the great handicaps of the University of Idaho is its location. So we have told ourselves and let others tell us. It came to be an accepted "fact," something to be excused. It was one of those mistakes of a by-gone day; too bad it happened, but, well, here we are.

Now, lo and behold, we have been all wrong. This time we have the figures and facts. We have the students themselves, at least those of the high school graduates who were brave enough to go against reason and attend this out of the way institution fo higher education.

Believe it or not, but the location of the institution ranked first among reasons why those 453 students were attracted to the quality of instruction. Third was economy.

All are very potent truths why the University of Idaho is the school for Idaho. The institution is located in a typical college town, the ideal college town, if you will. It is a town as clean morally as could be found in the country. It is a town small enough to provide safety and to unify the students into a solid group. It is large enough to provide moderate recreational outlets and interest and attract young minds. It is located in a wholesome climate. Its people are of a high type. It has no factories to adulterate the air or adulterate its strata of citizenship.

Then there is answer No. 2-quality. The standards of the institution its rating by every yardstick possible, its appraisal by other educators and other institutions, the record of its graduates, the admitted excellence of its researchers and its specialized branches, are evident to the parent or the student diligent enough to ascertain the facts. Apparently many do investigate before they name the university of their choice.

Third is economy. Moscow is an economical city. It is small, and neither the opportunity nor the temptation is present for extravagance. University regulations provide for economical living, economical budgeting of campus entertainments, economical management of cooperative housing groups. Fees and laboratory charges are held to a minimum.-Moscow Star-

LIGHT PROBLEMS

This idea of seeing or not seeing the light seems to be spreading, with the senior stunt not even having the first glimmerings of light. There are some who claim that to say that "Nothing is Something" is false, but here at Idaho we have come to know that Nothing is Something called a senior stunt. At that it was only just as much of a blank as most of their minds are, so what else could one expect from them. Oh, yes, the seniors also had a little cigarette idea of their own in that Anti-Lucky Strike chorus of theirs that didn't even avoid the present shadows, much less the future ones. Horace Greeley once gave some free advice to the effect that people should "Go West," so the arboretum has its own unique public. But due to the overflow, some of the folks have had to go east, to the City park, where the good citizens of Moscow have done all that they possibly can to make us see the light.
