The Exam Week Derby

What are you getting out of college? Do you cinch your saddle to a pony and go galloping through exams toward a row of gold keys to hang on your watch chain? Perhaps you have wrinkled up your nose at the sham of college honors and kept it buried in text books and lecture notes, so you can dish up what you think your professor wants on the nine-weeks exam.

No matter which course you take, this whole business of college education becomes a matter of beating the old battle axe who gives instruction in a little game called "lecture and quiz." It was college students and not college professors who originated this little game, and if any professors play it, it's because they learned it from their secretarial automatons.

There is very little difference between what the grind and the indoor horseman gets out of his college curriculum. One carries the printed page of his text book or the scrawls of his lecture notes in his mind, while the other carries them in his pocket or in the folds of his necktie. But the student with a pony is a horse thief.

The only trouble with the game is that the instructor is too easy to beat. He may or may not clamp down on the small percentage of students he catches cheating. Count up the number who have forfeited credits during the year for this petty thievery. It isn't funny.

And it's thievery, because every pony rider makes the honest student look more like a dumb-cluck.

Intercollegiate athletes have long supplied the great majority of Uncle Sam's track and field men, and the shift in dates will stop many of them from participating in the games because it will seriously interfere with their school work.

This of course, brings the absolute necessity of a field house for Idaho's teams once more to the front. Several weeks ago we explained the situation and the coaches' views on this matter, and hoped that some alumnus or some alumni organization would take the initial step in formulating plans for a field house. Nothing has been done apparently. If the alumni are really anxious to see their alma mater at the top of the ladder, here is one sure way of giving her a boost.
