Two UI buildings listed in refinancing proposal

The Physical Sciences Building and the Law Building are two buildings on the University of Idaho campus that are on a preliminary list of buildings that could possibly be refinanced to raise money to alleviate Idaho's revenue shortfall.

Public Works Administrator Brian Chase said a list of qualifications must be put on the buildings to be considered. He said the buildings have to be fairly new and free of any federal money.

"The legal requirements put a bit of a cloud on the process. The bond council must accept the building first. The attorney general may say it is legal, but it has to be practical for bond marketing," said Chase.

He said an office building in Lewiston, for example, would be practical because if the bond defaulted, a private owner would be inclined to buy it. "But this isn't the case with a science building on a college campus. It wouldn't be practical," he said.

Chase also said the Public Works Administration is only providing technical assistance for the Legislature. "We have just been providing information. The more we learn about it, the more skeptical we become," said Chase.

He said he is skeptical because if anything goes wrong in the process of trying to bond the building, the state of Idaho will still have its state deficit.

"The more we learn about this, the more roadblocks there are," he said.

Chase said the State Building Authority must decide in the next few weeks whether to refinance the buildings, or the money probably won't be available by July 1.

If the buildings are refinanced, the building authorities issue bonds to financial institutions such as Merrill Lynch. These institutions then sell these bonds to people in the upper income bracket, because the interest is tax exempt.

"The bonds are very appealing to these people," Chase said.

Assault victim isn't returning

The victim of a rape attempt last semester on the University of Idaho campus remains at her California home and will not return to the UI.

Although the case remains open, the investigation of the Dec. 16 assault near the Art and Architecture building is at a standstill, according to city police.

"All leads are totally exhausted," says Dan Weaver, sergeant in charge of the police campus division. The case remains open, however, and investigation will resume if any new leads should surface.

The female student reported that she was accosted by a large man with a knife at 9:45 p.m. on Dec. 16, but that he fled after she screamed for help. She received only a minor scratch in the attack.

The man was described as white, between 6 feet and 6 feet 3 inches tall, reported as wearing a ski mask, jeans, low-topped boots and a nondescript jacket.

Let's forget preregistration

Preregistration of University of Idaho students may save some of the hassles currently involved in the registration process. But even more problems would arise out of a proposal to implement preregistration at UI; and in the end, the plan is not worth implementing.

The UI's Computer Sciences department tried its hand this semester at registering students during the previous semester for the one following, and the problems created by the proposal made themselves self-evident then. It didn't help that the department ran its preregistration as something official when it was not; but those problems were incidental to the question of whether such a plan would work.

Other problems, however, did arise in the course of the preregistration. Some students were cut out of the classes available because they weren't tied to the Computer Sciences department.

There would be other problems, too, ones that are not likely to be self-evident in the early stages. It would be a dehumanizing process for the students, one in which they would not find themselves with the degree of flexibility they enjoy now in selecting courses. Moreover, many students likely would sign up for more credits than they would need in order to give themselves a safety margin, and thus they would squeeze out others.

Some of the scenarios resulting from this kind of situation would be nightmarish. Imagine coming back from Christmas vacation, believing that you've safely preregistered for the courses you want. Then you find out that a required course you wanted — say, English 103 — has been filled, and you're one of the lucky ones who got cut. So you rearrange your schedule once more, go through the line, and believe you're done with the mess. Then, a day after registration, you discover that not all of the preregistrants for 103 showed up, and there are openings in the class.

There would be some advantages to preregistration. The hassles in registration lines would be lessened. The figures on numbers enrolled in courses would be known in advance, and thus extra sessions could be more easily scheduled.

These gains hardly outweigh the disadvantages, however. More importantly, the full-day registration would still be there; all that would be achieved would be the addition of another layer of paperwork and possible confusion. And that brings up the final point:

The proposal would cost more money. And the last thing the university needs right now is a more expensive registration process that seems, at best, questionable in terms of efficiency.

QUIZ: PICK THE TRUE PEACEKEEPER

Bill Malan

More missile insanity

One of the issues expected to generate some controversy during the early sessions of the 98th Congress is the debate over the MX missile.

This poor missile has been bounced from one basing mode to another like an unfortunate foster child. Jimmy Carter, a peanut farmer, naturally favored putting the MX in shells and rolling them around. Just as naturally, Reagan, Weinberger, and a couple generals stuck close together in supporting a "Dense Pack."

Recently, a totally impeachable source related the latest scheme to base the MX. "The missiles are going to be assembled five to a group. Some are going to be painted black...then we cover them with huge concrete basketball jerseys. We call it 'the Zone Defense.'"

Actually, all the alternatives floated by the mainstream politicians are unpalatable. Even if the MX is scrapped, as it might well be, taxpayers are still forced to pay billions for weapons which do not enhance their security. What, then, would be a viable alternative?

The United States submarine-launched ballistic missile (SLBM) force consists of over 5,000 warheads — more than twice as many as are mounted on the entire ICBM leg of the strategic forces. Over one-half of the subs in the SLBM force are constantly on station, so the SLBM arsenal has at least as many warheads at its service as the ICBM's.

Furthermore, the SLBM's are nearly invulnerable, and therefore have the advantage of not having to be fired in a panic situation. For better or worse, the U.S. sub forces could sustain an attack for a couple of months after any massive attack on the U.S.

A viable option to the current practice then, would be to unilaterally dismantle all land-based ballistic missiles and to rely on the SLBM's for a ballistic missile deterrent.

Why, then, do our policymakers avoid this option? Probably for many reasons. First, because we have "always" relied on ICBM's. This "nuclear Maginot line" mentality, however, disregards current technology. If ever we needed to rely on ICBM's, that time is passed.

A second objection to dismantling our land-based missiles is that we will be "losing a bargaining chip" or be showing "a sign of weakness." To this, one may respond that, ostensibly, the purpose of our nuclear forces is deterrence — not a medium for power brokers to play poker or engage in macho silo rattling.

A third obstacle to working toward a saner deterrent is the nature of bureaucracy. The Air Force is a bureaucracy — armed, but a bureaucracy nonetheless. It is the nature of such entities that they try and increase their power and prestige. Everyone has witnessed the response of a bureau threatened; concerned elements and "expert" prophets of doom are suddenly parading about with tales of impending chaos lest 35 cents or some patently superfluous service be taken from its domain.

Since the inception of the ICBM program, the Air Force has taken great pride in operating these missiles. The end of the ICBM era would be a blow to the prestige of the Air Force.

This "preserving the prestige" aspect should cause one to look at statements by military officials regarding the critical need for ICBM's with a sharpened eye. As one political observer noted, "Pentagon spokesmen sing different tunes about the threat depending on whether they want to reassure Congress about the safety of the nation or scare extra billions out of the taxpayer."

The above mentioned hurdles to dismantling the ICBM's are formidable, but it would be a great reversal of the trend we are now in if these hurdles could be crossed. Most importantly, the people of our country would be safer, and not have to fear a strike against our land-based missiles which would also take out 10 or 20 million citizens with it.

Second, a reduction in costs of maintaining our military would occur. With fewer missiles, fewer people would be needed to maintain them and a saving of resources would be realized.

Another positive result of this proposal would be good P.R. — something which Reagan with his jingoist bluster cannot attain. It would entail a real cut in nuclear forces, and put the onus on others to follow our lead.

We do not need ICBM's. They harm rather than promote our security. They are an unnecessary cost at a time the government is running deficits that would probably choke Lord Keynes. Let your voice be heard: let Congress know where they can put those missiles.

Athletes

By Colleen Henry and Mike Stewart
Argonaut editors

Athletes and academicians live and work side by side at the University of Idaho. The student attending school on an athletic scholarship is in the same classroom as the one on academic scholarship. The academically oriented student often goes to games to root for his fellows on the athletic side of the aisle.

Yet there is often a difference in perception between the two groups. Academic students often view their athletic fellows as pampered. After all, they believe, it is the athletes who receive the full-ride scholarships; it is they who enroll in Basket Weaving 101 so they can sail through four years of school for the sole purpose of playing whatever sport it is they play; and it is they who can skip classes without much fear of reprisal because they can get the coach to pressure the professor.

But is this kind of perception accurate? "I really think we're very anxious for athletes to have academic success," UI athletic director Bill Belknap said. "We place a heck of a load on a student athlete. When you consider the time involved, then consider that he has to carry 12 units ... I think we do place a real strong load on them to compete successfully in athletics and compete in the classroom," he said.

But, for the most part, student athletes are not recruited with the classroom in mind, and there are many differences between learning in the classroom and on the field.

Many intercollegiate athletes are scouted and awarded full-ride scholarships. The UI has 136 athletic scholarships. About 100 are classified full-ride and are distributed mostly among football and basketball players, according to Belknap.

These scholarships differ from academic scholarships in number and in amount.

An athlete on a full-ride scholarship is given $2,828 for two semesters, a standard set by the National Collegiate Athletics Association. For non-residents, that number is increased to $4,828 to pay for non-resident fees, and for foreign students, to $4,928. These scholarships are defined by the NCAA as any required tuition, regular fees, books and supplies, and room and board costs of a student living on campus.

The total dollar amount of athletic scholarships is $371,806, making the average sports scholarship about $2,734. That money comes from student fees and Vandal Booster donations.

On the academic side, there were 1,498 UI academic scholarships available to the approximately 9,000 students registered last year. The total dollar amount of the scholarships came to $962,494, with an average scholarship being $642.51, an amount which sharply contrasts with the average athletic scholarship of $2,734.

Due to recent personnel changes in the Financial Aid Office, Anne Bailey, assistant director, was not sure how many academic scholarships are considered full-ride or what is the largest money amount of any available scholarship.

Because a certain stigma surrounds the supposed excesses of intercollegiate athletics, there are some other differences between academic and athletic scholarships. According to Don Huskey, student financial aid adviser, athletes on scholarship are not allowed any money for personal expenses while the regular student applying for financial aid can claim up to $800. Full-ride athletic scholarships average about $1,100 less than the $4,446 regular students can apply for each year.

Huskey attributed this to the NCAA wanting to avoid what some schools across the country have been accused of — buying athletes.

Because of the tight standards set by the NCAA, all tenders and offers made to athletes must be made through the Student Financial Aid office and any subsequent awards made to them are closely monitored, according to Huskey.

Harry Davey, former financial aid director, said that "when that type of financing comes in, there has to be very close regulation, in order to keep any reasonable competition going."

Davey said he thinks athletes suffer under more discrimination than other students. "These guys really sacrifice a lot to stay in the athletic program," he said.

But are they sacrificing enough?

A recent article in Sports Illustrated documented the success of athletes as scholars at Notre Dame University in North Bend, Ind. While some would say it isn't fair to compare the graduation rate of student athletes at Notre Dame with those at this university, there are those that feel if UI programs are not as difficult to get through as those at Notre Dame, then the graduation rate at the UI should be equal if not higher.

At any rate, 94 percent of the student athletes at the Catholic university graduate within their five year eligibility period.

Both Bill Belknap, UI athletic director, and Dave Kellogg, sports information director, said no statistics are kept at the UI on the number of athletes that graduate during their eligibility. The only figures available were from Terry Armstrong, executive assistant to UI President Richard Gibb.

He said 14 of the last 16 basketball players to graduate here did so within their period of eligibility. Basketball players Reed Jaussi and Jeff Brudie, both from Idaho Falls and 1981 graduates, did very well academically. Jaussi is enrolled in medical school and Brudie is attending UI's law school.

What kind of education are athletes getting from this university? A survey of programs football and basketball players are majoring in, shows that business and general studies are the two major areas of interest for athletes in both sports. That trend runs counter to the popular belief that athletes only major in physical education.

Fifteen football players and six basketball players are business majors, however, general studies is the big draw among football players, with 16 in the program.

"At this university, there are very few courses that one can take to avoid taking a full academic load," Belknap said. "It's not unique for an athlete to look for an easy class or two. Other students do it too."

Other major areas of study that draw students from both football and basketball teams are communications, physical education and recreation education.

Belknap added that he didn't think athletes here get a break in the classroom. "On the whole, it works the other way. There are just as many who hold you to a higher standard," he said.

Another question that crops up often is: If athletes are going to college to play sports and they don't really plan on graduating with a degree after four or five years, why are they going to school at all?

For many major college athletes, the answer is to get a shot at the professional ranks one day. While many graduates of big schools with great sports reputations like Penn State, USC, Notre Dame, the Ohio States and Michigans do get chances to try out for a spot with one of the NFL or new USFL teams, only two football players who graduated from the UI are now making a go of it in the pros: Tom Coombs of the New York Jets, and John Yarno, a center for the Seattle Seahawks.

Ken Owens and Don Newman are the two basketball players who have in recent years come the closest to making the grade in the National Basketball Association. Newman was one of the last players cut by the Boston Celtics a few years ago, and last year, Owens was the last guard cut by the Seattle SuperSonics.

There have, of course, been the Jerry Kramers and the Gus Johnsons who went on to superstardom in the pro ranks. But they number relatively few compared to the hundreds of athletes who walk through the UI's doors every year. The University of Idaho is apparently not the place to attend school if making the big leagues is the ultimate goal.

And if the UI is not the best springboard into the pros, then its key role for athletes should be to educate them. Whether it achieves that adequately is a question only the athletes can answer.

Next: A look at athletics as a fundraising device.

All's not lost

UI faces Weber in key Big Sky game

By Kevin Warnock
Sports editor

While most teams in the Big Sky Conference set making the post-regular season tournament as their annual goal, the Idaho Vandals and their followers look to host the four-team event, not just make the field.

The "pressure" to win on the players and coaches comes from two sources: fans who assume Idaho will win, not just 20 games a year; but the right to host the tourney and advance to a nationally respectable showing in the NCAA, and opposing teams who point to Idaho in what can be referred to as "UCLA Syndrome".

The pressure caught up with the Vandals for the first time since late November last Saturday night in Reno, Nev. The Vandals' 11-game winning streak was snapped in a 73-69 overtime loss to the Wolf Pack.

We call it UCLA Syndrome not because Idaho is in any way identical to the Bruins of NCAA championship fame, but because in every game Idaho will play, the opponent will be at an emotional peak. For those unfamiliar with how intensity affects play, remember what Idaho's football team played on for a whole season after losing an early game to Montana. Intensity instilled by a rookie head coach turned Vandal grid fortunes around OVERNIGHT.

Teams facing UCLA today still feel an overwhelming sense of accomplishment if victorious, almost like they beat John Wooden, Lew Alcindor and Bill Walton themselves.

Idaho now faces the same type of thing. Beating Idaho puts you on the map.

At UNR, the Vandals enjoyed a lead of 21 points at one time so the frustration seemed a little higher, but the fact of the matter is Idaho will, like every other team, lose some games.

You can't second-guess the coach, or the players, although instances could have been better. Missed lay-ups and turnovers don't figure into any offense but they do occur. A loss on the road now does not tarnish the fame of the Idaho program.

Pep rally set

A pep rally will be held Thursday, Jan. 20 at 4 p.m. in Memorial Gym, prior to the Idaho men's basketball game with league-leading Weber State.

A trophy will be awarded to the living group demonstrating the most spirit.

It does, however, bring things down to earth.

Idaho will host the Big Sky playoffs by earning the right. With a loss this early it brings about those "must win" situations earlier than people would like to see them. Certainly Thursday's game with Weber State is one of these.

"Our goal is to win the conference. You can lose two, but three and chances are slim of hosting it," said Coach Don Monson. The addition of a trip to Col-

Women cagers drop to 7-5

The tougher competition of the new Mountain West Athletic Conference has taken its toll on the Idaho women's basketball team as they were corralled by Portland State 73-61 Saturday night in Portland, Ore.

The Vandals, now 0-2 in league play and 7-5 overall, return to the friendly confines of the Kibbie Dome to host Weber State Thursday and Idaho State Saturday. Both games are conference matches, with the Weber game being a preliminary game to the Idaho men's battle. Tip-off is scheduled for 5:30 p.m. and 7:30 p.m. Saturday.

Portland State shot a hefty 76 percent in the first half, while the Vandals were held to just 25 percent, to build a big lead and hand Idaho their fourth loss in six games. PSU jumped to a commanding 37-19 lead and held on to the win.

Swimmers split

Despite a heavy week-long practice schedule, the Idaho men's and women's swim teams performed well last Saturday in a co-ed meet against Central Washington and Montana at the Idaho swim center.

The women easily defeated Central Washington 72-30, while bowing to powerful Montana 38-62.

In the men's meet, the Vandals were defeated 39-73.

Vandals

umbia, S.C. and a regional CBS telecast adds another homework assignment for the Vandals this week. The game with the Gamecocks begins at 9:30 a.m. (PST).

"At this point we're not even preparing for the South Carolina game. We're putting more time in for Weber; hopefully that won't hurt us in the end," Monson said. For some teams, a Saturday morning, jet-lagged game, on-the-road, non-conference, would certainly be a distraction during the week prior.

Don't expect this to be the case for Idaho, because they don't make excuses, they make up.

ARE YOU INTERESTED IN SAVING $$$?

If you are calling long distance from campus, collect or billing to your parents' telephone calling card, you are paying operator assisted rates. Operator assisted rates are approximately 2/3 higher than the direct dialed rate you would pay if you placed the call from your campus telephone and billed to your own student calling card.

To learn more about the conveniences of student calling cards, and to make arrangements for your card, call our business office today ... 882-2511.
