First black fraternity colonizes on campus

By MATT LAWSON
Editor

The University of Idaho has granted the first African-American fraternity in the state of Idaho permission to receive a charter on campus next month.

Phi Beta Sigma will receive its charter September 29 and will initiate seven charter members.

The charter members are Eric Hayes, Calvert Johnson, Devon Pearce, Noah Ramsey, William Saffo, Chris Taylor and Everett Wilson.

Taylor, who will serve as acting president, started the initial groundwork for the charter last April.

Phi Beta Sigma was originated in 1914 at Howard University and stands by the motto "Culture for Service, Service for Humanity" said Taylor, who will be the chapter's first president.

Currently there are over 85,000 members in more than 400 chapters in the United States, Africa, Europe, Great Britain and the Caribbean.

Bennie Harris, a graduate student at Washington State University, will serve as the graduate chapter advisor.

"I feel that our presence will be an enhancement both to the University and the Moscow community," said Harris, who was a Phi Beta Sigma member at Mississippi State University in 1985. "The University and the charter-

University of Idaho President Dr. Elisabeth Zinser is looking forward to a new addition to the university.

"I'm really pleased to see it develop," Zinser said. "I have no doubt they're going to make a wonderful contribution on campus."

Homes opened to UI students

By KATE HOLESTINE
Staff Writer

Running water, a little privacy and a bed are the basics of what any college student asks for when "house hunting."

In early June, The Idahoonian had very few listings for housing students could afford. There were trailers in the trailer court behind the Chelan Apartments for sale for $1000-$3000. Apartments that were empty were outrageously priced and houses were even more expensive.

The "Make Room" program here at the University of Idaho consists of privately owned houses that residents are opening up to rent because of the housing crunch that is hitting students in Moscow.

The ASUI has made available an off-campus housing list. It contains rooms, a roommate wanted section, houses for rent and houses wanted to rent. This looks and sounds like a great and innovative idea at first glance, but inside there are still high prices and very restrictive guidelines.

"All listings are for non-smokers, and of course no pets and no kids go right along with that," said Patsy Edgar, ASUI Secretary.

There are 15 rooms for rent listed, but six will be pulled from the list today because they have run for two or more weeks. Some listings run so long because they haven't been rented or the owners don't call back to cancel.

Many of the ads for rooms were non-smoking renters with no pets or children, but the prices are still high. Two of the rooms listed are rented at $150/month. The rest range from $200-$300/month. Many students have a hard time paying that much and giving up their privacy

"A lot of people don't consider this because they don't want that type of situation — living in someone else's house," Edgar said.

The roommates section also appears to be expensive. The majority of the roommates would be spending $250-$300 even if they plan to split the rent expenses.

"There are several roommate situations, but the prices are expensive, $300 a month. How can students afford that for only a room in a house?" Edgar said. "People know students have to have something (a place to live) so they take advantage of it."

The problem is not with the rental units, it is with the housing commission of Moscow. There is no set roof on housing and rental prices in Moscow and many students and citizens feel they are being taken for granted because of that fact.

"The University needs to realize the median age of its students is changing to a non-traditional age and they need to do something to remedy the housing situation," Edgar said.

Competition fierce for Moscow pizza dollars

By DERRICK BROWN
Staff Writer

Pizza anyone? Pizza is one of the most common foods consumed by college students, so it should be no surprise that pizza makers are out for student business.

In fact, specials designed to entice college students are abundant in Moscow. Two for one deals, a large pizza for the price of a small, even simple coupon specials are all used to draw the college dollar.

With over a half dozen pizza places in Moscow, competition is keen. As each business tries to carve out its place, it must also worry about the other businesses who are doing the same.

"The competition makes it more challenging," said Dara Sellers of Pizza Perfection. "I would say definitely college students are a big part of our market."

Even though new competition had emerged, sales seem to be going well.

"We're up over last year," Sellars said. "The only thing we're doing differently is two for one carryout." That may be just the edge Pizza Perfection needs to remain the local pizza champ.

However, with fifty cent slices of pizza during lunch, Pizza Pipeline is coming on strong. Lines stretching to the street are common during peak lunch hours, and students seem to be the major consumers.

Marc VanHar, day manager at Pizza Pipeline, felt that location plays a part in their business success, but he also felt for being new, they were doing extremely well.

"We did get a good location. We've got the downtown (area)," said VanHar. "That's why we get the lunch rush."

VanHar also stated delivery business was picking up for the new restaurant, despite the fact advertising has not yet played a substantial role.

"Business is getting better

Minorities hurt by suicide publicity

By KALISTA BARCLAY
Asst. News Editor

When a tragedy strikes a community, the victims are not always directly involved in the incident. Often times victims are those people who will not feel the effects until some time after the incident has been forgotten.

Ben Coronado is one such person.

As Assistant Director of New Student Services and a minority counselor for the University of Idaho Coronado says he has seen the effects of the recent suicide on campus on his job, but expects the worst is yet to come. According to Coronado the incident will definitely have an effect on the enrollment and recruitment of minorities to the university.

"This next year will be a big indication as to how much the effect of the incident will carry impact on years to come," said Coronado. "If anything, we'll see fallout occurring in out-of-state enrollment in the next few years as a result of the incident, not excluding Southern Idaho. It's hard enough battling the close family unit of minorities, let alone pulling them to a place that may seem even slightly dangerous."

Coronado said the press coverage of the suicide has had a tremendous impact on prospective students. "The sad thing of all of this is that the follow up story won't get the kind of press that the initial story did and never will," Coronado said. "They (minority students) won't know the real story until they talk to me."

Coronado said he felt the people of the university and Moscow were behind him after the incident. "What's surprising is that I found as I talked to minority students and minorities in the community I was proud to see a united feeling of anger," Coronado said. "I'm proud that minorities have a feeling of pride and want to take a stand."

Coronado added that the expansion of his responsibilities with recruitment and retention and counseling by Hal Godwin has encouraged him. "Hal Godwin showed confidence in me," Coronado said. "For him to realize there is a need for that (counseling) showed great insight on his part."

Coronado said that the university is still in the fledgling state as far as minority retention programs are concerned. "I am seeking students who are ready to step forward and who aren't afraid to make a difference in Moscow," Coronado said.

"The sad thing of all of this is that the follow up story won't get the kind of press that the initial story did and never will."

— Ben Coronado
Asst. Director of New Student Services

Coronado is fairly optimistic about the outcome of the incident on the recruitment and retention of minority students. "The incident is not going to totally stamp out our effort up to this point as far as minority students are concerned," Coronado said.

There are several reasons for this confidence cited by Coronado. One is the recruiting tools he possesses in the students already enrolled at the university. "Sophomores and freshman are the best recruiting tools; they are excited and it is still a new place to them," Coronado said. "When those students go home and talk to their friends they spread their good experiences at Idaho around in their home towns. That has more impact than any explanation I can give."

A second "tool" is the rise in organization of minorities, according to Coronado. Student groups such as MECHA, the Latin American Student Association, the Native American Student Association and the African American Student Association are up in membership and will carry a lot of weight in recruitment in the next few years, according to Coronado.

"Those groups provide a support group for those minority students," Coronado said. "It gives them a sense of home and some understanding to help with the transition to the university."

Coronado stated that special minority scholarships are another resource that he uses to recruit minority students. These scholarships are in the category of general scholarships but are specially earmarked for minority scholars.

One such scholarship is the Minority at Risk Scholarship. This scholarship is given each year to nine minority students who are incoming or continuing students at the university, according to Coronado. The scholarship is for $2,500 for four years or for the years remaining until the recipient graduates.

A fourth "tool" is the student athletes of the university. "Athletes will always be a strength to recruitment," Coronado said. "Statistics show that enrollment goes up as teams do well in play-off games." That goes for all students including minority students, not just student athletes, Coronado said.

According to Coronado, people have a misconception about the lives of minority students here at Idaho. "Blacks and minority athletes are still very excited about competing for U of I and getting their education here," said Coronado.

Coronado says he feels he is part of the mission of the University of Idaho. That mission, according to Coronado is to bring differences to the university so that students' education is advanced by having a whole different world brought to them and by the student learning to appreciate that world.

"I think we bring cultures to campus to celebrate them and not to change them and mainstream them," Coronado said.

Tribunal watching out for UI fraternities

By CHRISTIAN THOMPSON
Staff Writer

Frequently nicknamed "the watchdog" of fraternities, Tribunal Council is the judicial body for the Inter-Fraternal Council (IFC).

Tribunal consists of nine members who apply for a position, are slated by the already present Tribunal, and appointed by IFC. Though not all 18 fraternities are represented in Tribunal, Mike Smole, Tribunal Chairman, believes all fraternities are well represented and the nine members are less biased because not all 18 are present.

Tribunal meets whenever a situation arises in which a fraternity is accused of an infraction. These infractions can range from unethical rush practices to hazing. Tribunal asks the Council, a newly formed investigated body, to follow up on the accusations and report back to Tribunal with the findings. After the investigation, Tribunal meets with the accused fraternity, passes judgement, and imposes sanctions.

Some sanctions Tribunal can impose are: removal of recognition from IFC, social probation, educational programming, and fining.

Through their sanctions, Tribunal is trying to reform and help the accused fraternity by assisting to solve the problem, educate the fraternity, and rebuild the greek system as a whole.

"We're trying to help them come back to the greek system as contributing members," adds Smole, but he admits it can be tough.

"It's harder to think up a package of sanctions that punishes but also concentrates on long term education that in the end, is more beneficial to the chapter," Smole said.

Chris Zenner, the former President of Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity, said Tribunal did what they could in their situation, but they were inexperienced with how to deal with an incident of hazing.

He added, "I wish they had waited until after our Nationals had punished us before imposing sanctions ... our National requirements were more than sufficient. We were hit from four sides; the University, Tribunal, Panhellenic, and our Nationals."

"We're trying to help them (offenders) come back as contributing members."

— Mike Smole
Tribunal Chairman

Some of the sanctions imposed upon the SAE's included "Adopt a Highway," which Zenner felt had nothing to do with the issue of hazing, and confronting the issue with all of the other greek houses, which he felt increased their support and the greek understanding of the issue. He said although Tribunal was inexperienced, they had to do something and they did.

Linda Wilson said Tribunal "is doing a great job. Their affect on the greek system is big and they confront situations that aren't the most positive. But they ask good questions and come up with good answers and they take their responsibilities and challenges to heart."

1991 Registration goes smoothly

By JEFF KAPOSTASY
News Editor

Late August, hot sun, emptying bank accounts, and standing in line at the Student Union Building, not the Kibbie Dome. Sound familiar? Sounds like registration 1991.

Except for an occasional line winding down the stairs of the SUB all the way to the Alpha Tau Omega fraternity, this year's registration went smoothly and was even marked by various improvements designed to make the registration process a little less taxing on the students.

Among the additions implemented are a drop/add "hotline" that allows students to drop or add a class by phone.

"In the past, students had to fill out cards and do it all manually," said Matt Telin, registrar director. "Last year, there was a total of 55,000 drop/add cards that had to be processed. This year, almost all of it is done by computer."

The number to dial to drop or add a class is 885-9000. You must give your student I.D. number, birthdate, the subject number, course number, and section number. The telephone number can only be used by students with eight credits or more. By Wednesday afternoon, there had been nearly 9,000 drop and adds.

Another registration upgrade was the movement of registration from the Kibbie Dome to the SUB. The reason for this, according to Telin, is a more computer-based registration system and many more people taking advantage of pre-registration.

Opinion Desk - 208-7715

New UI registration system easier than people think

For all you unsuspecting freshmen out there who are fortunate enough to have never had to go through arena registration, let me share with you a registration nightmare that will really make you feel lucky.

When I was a freshman registration meant going to the Kibbie Dome and waiting in endless lines for a teacher to say, "Sorry, this class is closed." Of course your entrance into the dome was determined alphabetically and being a "J" I was the last letter to register (go figure). Once I was finally allowed to enter the "registration zone" just about every class on this campus was closed. Needless to say, I was frantic trying to put together a halfway sensible schedule. Suddenly I took a second to look up and realized I was the last student in the dome and the teachers were packing up to leave! Hysterically I raced from one end of the dome to the other begging the teachers to stay. Having no luck, I ended up traipsing all over campus on the first day of classes trying to accumulate at least 12 credits to be considered a full time student.

Imagine this for one minute and tell me you don't agree that anyone not taking advantage of Idaho's pre-registration certainly likes doing things the hard way.

For three semesters now UI has offered its students the opportunity to register with ease, as opposed to the Kibbie Dome hell that one used to face at the start of each semester.

Fortunately, due to the "new and improved" pre-registration, one will never again have to face the screaming masses.

This new system allows each student to go to any of the roughly 450 available computers on campus, type in the classes of their choice, and if the Gods are truly on their side, be on their way in a matter of minutes. Granted, sometimes the classes are closed and the student must enter a second choice, but even entering a third or fourth choice beats standing in "one" line in Kibbie Dome hell.

Now if you think that sounds easy, wait until you hear this! A new feature has been added to this fabulous system. Starting last May, all a student has to do to drop, add, or confirm classes is to pick up a phone. By dialing 885-9000 and simply following the instructions of a computerized voice, one can have the entire system at their fingertips.

I know, I tried it today, and in 30 seconds I had dropped a class, added a class, and received a complete listing of the times and places that each class was to be held. If you don't find that impressive you might like to know that the University of Idaho and the University of Iowa are the only two campuses in the nation that have this combination of student user registration.

Call me crazy, but if you're not using this system, you deserve to be buried alive in the Kibbie Dome.

— Tami Jones

Ignorance of Animal Rights Activists Intolerable

On August 12 or early August 13, an animal rights group calling themselves the Animal Liberation Front, broke into several offices at the United States Department of Agriculture facility at Washington State University. While there, they destroyed several pieces of office equipment and poured concentrated hydrochloric acid on other equipment. The most damaging act, however, was the release of several captive animals in the facilities which included seven coyotes, six mink and 10 mice. Of these animals, only two coyotes have been recovered. According to Dr. Fred Gilbert, chairman of the Natural Resources Department at Washington State University, the chance of the other animals slowly starving to death is fairly high because they have diets that require special care. In addition, Dr. Gilbert said because the animals are born and raised in captivity, they are familiar with humans, and this makes them vulnerable when they are on their own. The obvious paradox is why would an animal rights group release captive animals that have little or no chance of surviving out in the wild? Isn't this hypocritical of these animal rights people to harm the very animals they seek to protect?

The answers to these questions provide the basis for criticism of many modern animal rights groups. Many groups like the ALF that raided WSU acted like outright terrorists with their death threats against many scientists, who work with animals in addition to bombings and acts of sabotage. The scope of their actions haven't been limited to this area because animal rights activists have bombed and sabotaged facilities at universities in both Arizona and Oregon among others.

The aspect, which particularly infuriates me, is the ignorance of many of these groups. These people believe they are doing the animals a huge favor by releasing them or bombing the facilities where they reside. Since these animals require very special care, they simply won't survive on their own because the average person doesn't know how to care for them. Criminal acts like this not only endanger the lives of the animals these groups seek to protect, but they also halt research that benefit human beings. For example, these people must not know how much progress has been made against diseases such as cancer and heart disease. What we know about behavior and intelligence comes in part from work with primates, dolphins and other animals.

Doug Taylor
Commentary

The group that claimed responsibility for the sabotage at WSU ignorantly stated their belief that animals at WSU were being treated cruelly in order to benefit the fur industry. This group hasn't come up with any documented evidence to back up their statements, and this casts serious shadows on their credibility. In addition, how credible are they if they jeopardize the very animals they seek to protect.

If somebody thinks animals are being treated inhumanely, then that person needs to organize an opposition group to demonstrate at the site of the animal facility where the inhumane acts are supposedly taking place. To get the attention of somebody powerful in Congress, a person could then get in contact with a powerful animal rights activist group like

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Incidents ignore bigger picture

Editor;

First, a suicide by an Israeli, then an effigy labeled "I was a Jew." We were advised by Dr. Godwin to "put (the suicide) behind us," and informed by several top UI administrators to view the effigy as "a prank." Both view points suggest we are to perceive these events in isolation, that their impact upon us be miniscule. Those ideas ignore the broader context of Jewish history.

Perhaps Sharon Akhavan's decision to end his life had no direct relationship to his ethnic background; perhaps the high school students had no direct anti-semitic intent in constructing their effigy. Nevertheless, for Jewish residents of the Palouse, whether American-born or Israeli, the dual image of Sharon's lifeless body and the label on the effigy were genocidal campaigns that left many of their family members dead in Eastern Europe and the Ukraine.

This persecution is not a simple past, over and done: in Germany, France, England today, a neo-Nazi movement has surfaced, and is visibly active. Thus, it becomes impossible for the sensitive, humane and broad-minded among us to "put it behind us," call it "a prank," or feel relieved to discover that Sharon's death was "just a suicide, not a hate crime." Let us rather keep these bitter events in our minds and hearts, so that, like the Holocaust victims, like the French people after the Nazi defeat, we can declare, "Jamais plus!, Never again!"

Cecilia apologizes for offending anyone by her statements that homosexuals should be accepted. If she really believes that gay people are okay, then why does she need to apologize for this? Homophobia, like racism and sexism, is a disease running rampant in our society. By failing to stand up to the perpetrators of these diseases, we only serve to encourage their narrow-minded hatred.

The analogy of homosexuality to drug use insinuates that gays are fighting a problem they hope to eventually overcome. This is not true. The problem that virtually all homosexuals face is concerning how "out" they are willing to be. I know people who have lost their jobs, custody of their children, been raped and even murdered, all because the wrong person or persons found out they were gay.

It is heartening non-gay individuals are interested in stamping out homophobia. However, please use caution in your writing, because the wrong message may reach an impressionable audience.

Who is this Maslow man and what do his so-called "needs" have to do with me? I need to come up with a car by the weekend!

Put that in your hierarchy. I just have to win that convertible. That's all. I've never won anything before.

Except for the Bundt Cake in cub scouts. It's a brand-spankin' new GEO METRO —

topless,
fast

and I've come to believe it's rightfully mine. There's got to be something I can do to tilt the odds. I'd date Maslow if I thought it would like the fact that it got me to open a checking account.

Dad will want to know if I get free checks, if I have a VISA card, if I have ATM access, and if the account stays open during the summer. I'll respond with a resounding "yes."

Mom, on the other hand, will want to know what's on my checks — little desert vistas or scenes from the Donner Party?

"Now class, who can summarize Maslow's hierarchy of needs? Anyone?"

help. Course, I'd dump him after dinner. I'm obsessing now. Think about something else.

Personalized license plates would be nice. Although studlicious is probably taken. I wonder if Mom and Dad will like me better with a Geo Metro? They'll certainly I'll tell her that's personal. Let's just pray this whole open-a-student-checking-account-and-enter-to-win-a-Geo thing actually gets me the car.

I'm obsessing again. If I win, I win. If I lose, I just become more dysfunctional.

French businessman proposes exchange

By SHARI IRETON
Staff Writer

This year, there are many foreign exchange students visiting the University of Idaho. However, here's an opportunity for four business students from the Palouse Universities to travel to the French Alps.

Beginning in January 1992, two UI students and two Washington State University students will be attending classes in Savoie, France. Dr. Guy Marmet, director of L' Ecole Supérieure de Commerce de Chambéry at Savoie, visited the UI this week to interview prospect students about the exchange. Marmet arrived at the university Sunday and spent most of the week working with international business students and UI faculty.

The program began last April as a development of the UI foreign language program and after literature Professor Alan Rose's sabbatical in France. Marmet, who has been a visiting professor in England, Germany, Canada and Poland, said the school in Savoie also does exchanges with Oslo Business School, Sweden; Lester University, England; and Esma University, Spain.

The students from UI and WSU will also act as volunteers at the 1992 Winter Olympics, which will take place near Savoie. The students will act as American contingents and will have room, board and Olympic uniforms provided during their stay.

Marmet said that Savoie is very similar to Moscow in that it has about 8,000 students and is not an industrial town. He also stated the UI campus looked "very British" and the students from Savoie would find it very attractive.

When asked about the immediate effect of the recent crisis in the Soviet Union, Marmet stated the European business world would experience confusion. As a marketing consultant, Marmet is warning his firms against doing immediate business in Eastern Europe.

"It is hard to tell who is an old Communist wearing a new vest," said Marmet.

Marmet earned his doctoral degree in management from Lyon University and has been the director of the business school at Savoie since 1989.

Business Incubator offers aid to new found businesses

By STEVE CORDA
Staff Writer

Four out of five dentists surveyed have never heard of the University of Idaho Business Incubator. Have you?

The North Central Idaho Business Technology Incubator is a joint project of the university, Moscow/Latah County Economic Development Council, and the City of Moscow. It is designed to foster businesses and jobs in the Idaho area.

The Incubator has been in operation since March of 1990 by identifying young and growing businesses and offering those businesses assistance for a one to three year period. The majority of new businesses fail during their first three years of operation. The Incubator works to prevent this failure by offering office space and services at little or no charge.

The Business Incubator facility leases over 17,000 square feet at rates beginning at five dollars per square foot per year. Other vital services offered by the Incubator to its tenant businesses include the use of a conference room, phone systems, and a secretarial and reception staff. The Incubator, however, does not participate in the management of its tenants. It merely provides its space and services and leaves each business responsible for its own day-to-day affairs and corporate policies.

The Business Incubator is located on Sweet Avenue. (It's the cream colored building with the green trim that looks more than a little bit like Taco Time.) This facility is the result of $1.8 million in grants provided in part by the Economic Development Administration of the United States Department of Commerce and the Community Development Block Grant Program of the Idaho Department of Commerce.

The Incubator is contracted by the UI to the Moscow/Latah Economic Development Council. An Economic Development Council advisory board offers suggestions on Incubator policy, but the final decision making power rests with the University. The EDC also oversees the Incubator's daily activities through Executive Director Bill Anderson as well as a secretarial and receptionist staff.

Anderson calls the facility "a job creation project," and although it is difficult to rate a business' success or failure in the year and a half of the Incubator's existence, he speaks optimistically. He calls the success rate "good" so far. "The building is over 90% full," he said. "The businesses are all doing well."

The UI Business Incubator currently houses seven diverse businesses. These businesses everyday," said VanHar. "For only being three weeks old, I'd say we're doing great."

What about the old standby? Domino's has felt the market saturation in the last couple of months, but is still hanging in there.

"We're a little bit under last year," said Joe Deymonaz, Domino's manager. "We're still doing pretty good." National advertising has helped to keep Domino's going, and has been augmented with local specials as well.

An informal student survey showed nine out of ten students preferred Pizza Perfection if they were to order a pizza, but many said if they had the money they would go to Pizza Hut. Pizza Hut may be slightly more expensive, but those polled thought the extra cost was worth the pizza and the service.

Another consideration is the time of day the pizza is ordered. Pizza Pipeline has used fifty cent slices to capture the lunch crowd, but quiets down in the evening.

Pizza Perfection, on the other hand, concentrates on the evening and night delivery crowds, as well as those willing to pick up their pizza and save some money.

The most telling sign of all was the fact no one really had time to give an interview. Most graciously made time to speak briefly with the Argonaut, but some were far too busy. Either business must not be too bad, or franchises are trying very hard to make a comeback. Whatever the answer may be, remember to choose your pizza with care. The franchise you save may be your favorite.

Gay and lesbian group active

By KARMA METZLER
Staff Writer

A barbecue will bring members of the gay and lesbian community together this weekend.

The Gay and Lesbian Association of the Palouse (GALA) is hosting a barbecue Saturday at 4 p.m. People who are interested can call 335-4311 for information and directions.

J., who asked not to use his full name to protect his identity, said GALA is a support group for people who are gay or lesbian. He said although the group is based in Pullman, about 30 people in its membership of more than 100 are from Moscow and the University of Idaho because there is not a GALA group on the UI campus.

J. said the group has the only lending library on the Palouse and offers books on homosexuality and heterosexuality. GALA also staffs a Speakers Bureau for classes and groups who want to discuss gay and lesbian issues and stereotypes.

GALA also works with the Washington State University Counseling Center which hosts a support group for gays and lesbians each Tuesday at 6:30 p.m.

J. said the gay community is not as open at UI and WSU as it is on other campuses. He said people are afraid to "come out" for fear of persecution. He said the racist activities in the area make it even more difficult.

"It kind of bothers me that somebody I've never seen before hates me," said J. "But then I think it's something about themselves. Some people have an irrational fear. I call that a phobia and they are the ones who need help."

GALA's answering machine gets crank phone calls and the group is victim to harassment when they hold a public event, J. said. The group's office is in the Koinonia House, the religious house similar to UI's Campus Christian Center.

J. said the group screens its calls and inquiries to weed out the pranksters. He also said GALA has police secure the buildings where dances are held to prevent events such as bomb threats and other forms of harassment.

Aside from social functions, J. said the group exists to let other members of the gay and lesbian community know they are not alone. He said college is a time when many people come to terms with who and what they are.

"When you're younger you think, 'I can't be this way,'" he said. "When you come to college, you're on your own. You learn you have to quit denying these feelings."

J. said denying any type of feeling is bad and said he has found a lot of people who start talking about their feelings and start feeling better about themselves.

He said GALA is planning a dance September 21 and a cruise over the Thanksgiving holiday. J. said people should call to get involved in the group or to find out more about their events.

man, who has coordinated efforts to establish the fraternity on campus believes diversity is important to the Greek system.

"This is going to be an excellent addition to the campus Greek system because the concept of a fraternity can take many forms," Pitman said. "This fraternity will bring new ideas and new ways of doing things to educate other fraternities."

The three key tenets of Phi Beta Sigma are brotherhood, scholarship and service. The focus of the fraternity's activities this year is on issues that "impact African-American males to improve national communities," Harris said.

All seven members are athletes playing on the UI football team, and the fraternity is hoping to dispel some of the myths about African-American athletes.

"Through our work with the community, I believe we will portray a positive image of African-American athletes in our community," said Devon Pearce a pre-season All-American running back for Idaho.

Phi Beta Sigma emphasizes community services and Harris said the fraternity is particularly active with the March of Dimes and First Lady Barbara Bush's "Read a Book" literacy program.

"The administration has been very supportive in helping us get involved with the Inter-Fraternal council and the minority students," Taylor said. "We wanted to create a positive image of African-American males on campus and throughout the Palouse."

"I think it (a black fraternity) is an addition to our think our Greek system that we have needed for a long time," Greek Advisor Linda Wilson said.

The chartering ceremony will feature a keynote address by Carter Womack international president of the fraternity and the executive vice president at Black Collegiate Magazine in New Orleans, LA.

Valero does things his way

Coach Art Valero whips his offensive line in shape.

By CHRISTOPHER GATEWOOD
Sports Editor

The University Idaho Vandal football team is running "suicides", and they aren't too pleased about it.

"Suicides" are a series of runs where the team runs the width of the field four times and rests in between. It's the end of practice and many of the players look like they are about ready to drop.

"QUIT DOGGING IT AND HUSTLE YOUR ASSES," yells offensive line coach Art Valero so loud that the Kibbie Dome nearly shakes off its hinges. These players won't drop. Valero won't let them.

Go to a Vandal practice and the sound of the whistle blowing is nearly as normal. In fact, Valero would rather scream than use his whistle. Valero pays the price as his voice sounds hoarse during the entire interview.

"I guess you could say I'm the type that goes a little crazy when I'm out at practice," he says. "I think practice is the time when you should have a chip on shoulder. When you do something you really enjoy doing, you have to go after it."

Valero's go after it attitude has spread like a disease around the Vandals. Or maybe it's more to the point to say it's spread to the muscles of the Vandals. Valero is also the strength coach and under his leadership the Vandals are as strong as they've been during the tenure of Head Coach John L. Smith.

"I directly attribute quite a bit of this to Art," Smith said. We had a great summer and our guys really went home and got after it. I think that says a lot about our football program."

The amount of strength the Vandals have gained in the weightroom is mind-boggling. Wide receiver Kasey Dunn benches 365 pounds, more than many of the Vandal offensive linemen. John Sirmon is the strongest all-around player on the team with a 425-pound bench press and a squat of nearly 700 pounds.

"John would squat the Kibbie Dome if I told him to, but I don't want him to get hurt," Valero said.

Defensive end Mat Groshong benches 415 pounds and 140 pound receiver Curtis Richardson benches nearly twice his weight at 265 pounds. Even kicker Thayne Doyle is strong as an ox. He bench presses over 300 pounds. Add that to the fact punter Tom Sugg bench presses 275 pounds and you have the strongest special team unit in the Big Sky Conference.

"I've had to get strong in the weightroom over the summer," Doyle said. "I don't want the coaches to think I was screwing around."

Defensive end Billy Simms definitely didn't do any screwing around over the summer. Simms, a junior this year spent the first three years in the Vandal program desperately trying to gain weight. He looked like a defensive end struggling to escape from a linebacker's body. He left for the summer weighing about 225 pounds. He reported to camp a rock solid 245 and didn't lose an ounce of speed.

"I worked really hard this summer to gain the weight," Simms said. I credit some of it to Valero's weight program and

It's coming! It is out of hand

It's everywhere! I'm surrounded! They're closing in on me and I can't stop them. I suddenly realize I'm being attacked by the Invasion of the Professional Sports Team Logos.

It seems over the last few years fans of various sports teams are looking like walking billboards. Anything you could ever want in your favorite team is available.

In fact, you could leave the house with a complete wardrobe of, let's say the Los Angeles Raiders equipment. First, you'd start with a pair of Raider boxer shorts and then a pair of socks for your undergarments. Next, pick from the enormous number of Raider shirts, sweats and shorts to complete the main ensemble. To polish things up, pick from the numerous hats, jackets and sweatshirts. Now you look like a true fan.

If you walk down the middle of campus on the way to class, you can see any superstar you want. Why, just the other day I could have sworn I saw Michael Jordan, Bo Jackson and Joe Montana hanging out on Greek Row.

I hope your credit card has a high limit, because all this paraphernalia is going to cost a pretty penny. Official Major League Baseball and wool hats will run you $20 a pop, jackets about $100, sweatshirts anywhere from $50-$100 and t-shirts and boxers will run $10-$15.

The total numbers for all the team sports are staggering. According to Pro Licensing Magazine, last year the NFL made $1.7 billion on all this garbage. The year before $1.5 billion, and in 1988 $1.1 billion. In baseball and basketball the numbers are nearly the same. Baseball, last year, raked in $1.5 billion and in hoops it was $1.2 billion.

Numbers like these say that much like gambling, drugs and horse racing, we have a serious addiction in this country. In fact, I put myself in the category of those who need psychiatric help.

I have two baseball teams that I follow: The San Diego Padres and the Detroit Tigers. I have hats and shirts for both. You know how I decide which hat I'm going to wear? By which team won the night before. Pretty sick, huh? My roommate and I like different football teams. He prefers the Philadelphia Eagles and I, the Pittsburgh Steelers. We have mugs for each team that sit on top of the TV set. We also have a hat rack in the living room that is full of every cap

Vandals challenge UW

The University of Idaho women will test their pre-season preparations with a four team round-robin tournament beginning Friday.

The UI Lady Vandals will host the Idaho Safeco Volleyball Classic and entertain the University of Washington Huskies, the Southern Illinois Salukis and Spokane's Gonzaga Bulldogs in a Labor Day weekend tournament.

Idaho will come up against the Salukis at 5:30 p.m. Friday in first round play. UI coach Tom Hilbert has no idea what to expect from Southern Illinois.

"We don't know a lot about them, but we'll find out Friday," Hilbert said.

But, the Vandals do have a general idea of how to approach the Huskies and the Bulldogs. Idaho has seen Washington and Gonzaga in this spring's pre-season play and last fall during the regular season.

"Gonzaga's not going to be as good a team as they were last year. Last season they were, I think, ranked 20th in the nation but they lost two all-conference players," Hilbert said.

Gonzaga has got an "ace" up their sleeves though, Kelly Cunningham, one of the top middle hitters in the nation. Cunningham attended and played in the Olympic Festival this year.

"Cunningham is a dynamic player, very hard to stop," Hilbert said.

"Cunningham is a very successful hitter, but the key to volleyball is to pass the ball and then get it to the hitter," Gonzaga coach Sean Maddon said. "We need ball control to get the set to her."

"Everybody is going to key on stopping her, so we're going to see if we can overcome that," Maddon added.

Oliver and Friesz hit it big

Part I of a two part series on former Vandals in the NFL

By MATT LAWSON
Editor

Charlie Oliver worked hard for five years at the University of Idaho and seldom recieved national attention.

By making the Cleveland Browns roster he now has the opportunity to achieve the attention he has always deserved.

After being ingnored in last spring's NFL draft the Spokane native took it as a challenge rather than a setback. "After the eighth round or so it didn't hurt me one bit that I wasn't drafted," Oliver said in a telephone interview Wednesday. "A lot of teams were calling me, but I didn't get drafted."

Oliver was picked up by Cleveland as a free agent and realized it could be to his advantage.

"It was better to be a free agent and get to a team that wanted me," Oliver said. "It feels great that all the guys that were here have been cut and I'm still here."

Oliver had a second obstacle in moving from his familiar position of cornerback in which he had an Idaho-record 18 career interceptions to safety.

"I felt pretty comfortable at training camp," Oliver said. "The camp was hard physically, but going from corner to safety was my biggest obstacle. It was more of a mental strain than anything physical throughout the whole camp."

John Friesz

Vandal coach John L. Smith was confident that Oliver could play in the NFL if given the right opportunity.

"I thought all along he could play (in the NFL)," Smith said of the player he coached for two years. "It was just a matter of him going to the right team. It is a great opportunity for him."

Oliver's hard work is what ultimately made the difference in making it with the Browns.

"That's why I'm still here," Oliver said of making the team ahead of drafted players. "A lot of guys that were here in the beginning didn't work hard and it showed. They thought they would just go out and make the team."

Defensive coordinator Craig Bray, who coached Oliver for two years, best described the circumstances.

"The bottom line is that it is the NFL," Bray said. "Charlie has proved himself as a player that they want. He's as good as anyone at Washington State or Miami for the short time I was there."

John Friesz is no longer trying to prove himself as a rookie, but faces the biggest challenge of his life Sunday against the Pittsburgh Steelers at Three Rivers Stadium.

Pittsburgh has arguably one of the best secondaries in the league and is a definite playoff contender.

After starting the final game of the year against the Los Angeles Raiders and beating out Billy Joe Tolliver in training camp Friesz is getting his big chance.

Friesz was named the starter last week and the Chargers traded Tolliver to Atlanta Wednesday to strenghten the Couer d'Alene native's future with San Diego.

"I'm not really surprised at my performance because I went in with a good attitude," Friesz said of his successfull training camp. "I hope they're not unrealistic and expect me to be superman but I want to go out and show everyone that the coaches made the right decision."

Friesz is glad to have the starting job but is not overconfident.

"I haven't really done anything yet," Friesz said of the anticipation of his first start. "I just do the best I can and let everything else take care of itself."

For John Friesz and Charlie Oliver, only time will tell.

Local theatre stands apart from the rest

By CECILIA M. THUNES
Staff Writer

Hey. Been to The Micro lately? No, they haven't added three more screens, nor have they added more seats. They haven't even raised the prices. As far as I can tell, there haven't been any changes at all. Which is exactly my point.

The Micro Cinema, located at Third and Almon Streets, maintains its status as a staple to the community. Bob Suto, part-owner of The Micro, claims he knows of "no other theatre that shows commercial, foreign, and art films for less than two dollars."

Bob Suto has owned The Micro with his sister and brother-in-law, Gabe and George Ball of Moscow, since May of 1978, a year after he graduated with a business degree from the University of Idaho. Suto's association with the university did not end upon graduation, however.

He often plays free shows for international and honors students. Suto's reasons are "Two-fold, really ... my priority is towards community service, and it's also good business."

Suto feels the success of The Micro is measured by the support of the community. He knows people love the theatre, and they are getting the best deal they can get anywhere.

Still, some customers continue to make negative comments about the price. To that, Bob says there is nothing he can do. He is always willing to take suggestions for different movies, though. He says he can get the majority of current movies, though Paramount is a little difficult to work with sometimes, because they would like him to charge at least three dollars. And once movies go to video, they are "out of service" and "not marketable."

Bob Suto is quick to point out The Micro wouldn't be as unique if it weren't for his work crew. He works with nine other employees who believe in the moviehouse as much as he does. The key to doing great things, says Suto, "is believing in what you do. You have to be committed to it; you have to like it."

"Suto feels the success of the Micro is measured by the support of the community."

He likes it. He likes the fact that no where else can you see Madonna's Truth or Dare and La Femme Nikita in the same theatre for $1.75. Hell, even the popcorn is cheap.

People also like The Micro because there is a sense of quality there. For instance, one would hardly ever see a horror flick there because Suto feels there just isn't enough quality in them. Unlike most other theatres, The Micro has the opportunity to choose which films are shown there, instead of being manipulated by corporate heads who theatre managers never meet, or have the option to discuss what to show.

There is a "tremendous amount of rewards" that go with running this small movie house in a small town. Even though Bob can put up to 80 hours a week into The Micro, he feels committed to the theatre and knows that it is a permanent part of Moscow. Take a friend to see a movie tonight, say "hi" to Bob, and remember his words, "The Micro is an institution."

Stars shine in flick

What About Bob?, showing right now at The Micro is a silly, hilarious, goofy, slightly schtick comedy starring Richard Dreyfuss and Bill Murray as psychologist and patient. Dr. Leo Marvin is hounded from New York to New Hampshire by Bob Wiley, the paranoid, psychotic, and obnoxious freak. Through events only Hollywood could imagine, psychosis transfers from patient to doctor.

True, the story was kind of lame, but Murray and Dreyfuss are such formidable actors it didn't really matter. Certain phrases in the dialogue ("Talk about moving, weird, divorce," etc. counsels Dreyfuss) smelled slightly like the cynicism of Moliere, poking fun at "the professionals" in our world.

Some people might take offense to the ridicule that was made at the expense of psychology, a respected practice, but I don't think there's really any need to get riled up. This movie was so campy any shrink would've had a good time with it.

Perhaps the only actors in this movie that could steal the show from Dreyfuss and Murray are Tom Aldredge and Susan Willis as the Guttman's, the enraged elderly couple out for revenge upon Dr. Leo Marvin. Their subtleties and not-so-subtleties were delightful and spontaneous, always there at the right time.

Cook uncovers artistic pornography in Cafe Flesh

By TIMMY COOK
Staff Writer

Pornography, or at least the pornography that is consumed around here (picked up from behind especially designed plaster walls in chain video stores) is a very bad thing. The subject matter, in my humble/correct opinion, is not simply bad because it is exploitive in nature or that is just offensive for whatever reasons, it is bad because it is generally very average, dull, monotonous, etc. etc. etc. ad nauseum.

Pornography sucks for the same reason Home Alone sucked--it never expresses anything new to the viewer, it just tries to package an image of a commodity that can never be consumed, just sorta looked at. These images run like a choppy documentary and last only as long as the television is on.

Recently issued by one of those semi-legitimate porn labels a film has emerged that embraces and transcends the genre of pornography into another enormo void called Art Film.

Much like the film I Am A Camera from the late 50's or so, Cafe Flesh is set in far-fetched post-apocalyptic world where a mere 1% of the population can enact sex due to the 'Nuclear Kiss'. In this ridiculous society, the 'sex-positives' are put into roles of exploitation by being forced into 'performing' for the 'sex-negatives' (yes, I know, this is awfully confusing for a stag film).

Based around a married couple that is separated by their inabilities to have sex without becoming violently ill--much like eating rancid Mexican food or seafood with bacon--Cafe Flesh is a film about the basic concept of need.

The sex scenarios enacted in the Cafe are also most unusual: the boss/woker relationship, the superpower nations embodied as sexual beings, the servant and the consumer and the bad cop with the victim.

Powerful images of the strung-out audience addicted to the role of witnessing this pagan showcase of incredibly disturbing sex scenes (especially in the video version that I saw), make huge statements about human dependency on manufactured drugs, in this case sex.

Cafe Flesh parodies pornography by embracing pornography from concept to realization to its final result which, as with all other pornography, is really nothing when all is said and done. This is a low budget film with a high imagination, directed by a fella named Rinse Dream, who turns what is usually a handicap of having no natural sound into a layered sound that coupled with the claustrophobic sets seems even more subterranean, a very odd looking film.

I'm not certain this is high art but it certainly works on a number of levels, check it out but make sure no one's looking before you dash around the corner in the store, I'd hate to think that something that I had recommended would somehow make you feel like some sort of pervert/Pee-Wee Herman type or something. Or rather, make sure everyone knows that you're back there and leave the store chanting slogans like "Leave children's programming for the kids!", and "Let the little rascal do his dance! Free Pee-Wee!"

Theatre student excels as actor and director

By RANDI ARNOLD
Staff Writer

To be an actor or to be a director, that is the question. It may be a very difficult one for the multi-talented John O'Hagan whose directing skills are soon to be on display in the Collette Theatre.

O'Hagan, a senior Bachelor of Fine Arts major at the University of Idaho, is not new to the stage. O'Hagan played Proteus in "The Two Gentlemen of Verona" and Bill in "Hot L Baltimore" last year, for which he received an Irene Ryan acting scholarship nomination.

O'Hagan placed in the top 16 out of 85 competitors at the Irene Ryan scholarship competition which was held at Eastern Oregon State College in La Grande last spring. He has acted for four semi-professional regional companies and was even in a television commercial for CBS.

So why is he directing? "I want to present different forms of drama and be able to work with new techniques," O'Hagan said, "It is an opportunity to work with more experimental material."

O'Hagan's material is The Shadowy Waters by William Butler Yeats.

"It is a dramatic poem about a sea captain who is following less than concrete guides to find his ultimate happiness," as O'Hagan describes it. "It is a classic piece of Literature".

Words were of the utmost importance to Yeats, as he used verse and rhythm, not visual pictures, to evoke emotions. O'Hagan wants to stress these qualities in his production as well and is therefore using some of Yeats' own dramatic theories.

Performances of the play can be seen on October 3, 4, and 5th at 8 p.m. and October 6th at 2 p.m. at the Collette Theatre, which is in the U-Hut on the University of Idaho Campus.

So what are O'Hagan's future plans? Does he want to be an actor or a director?

"I want to work with more classical and experimental theatre. I never want to stop challenging myself. You never stop becoming an actor."

Sharin' with Karin

By Karin Mason
Staff Writer

Dear Karin,
I am an incoming freshman at the UI, and I don't have a clue. The school is great, and the people are nice, but I look in the mirror and see a fool. I went to the Dome to run stairs, but didn't realize the ones I was supposed to run were the ones around the field, so I spent an hour running the stairs from the first floor to the racketball courts.

I had a great workout, but everyone gawking and pointing and saying "Look at that stupid freshman" made me feel like a geek. I know this incident is only the beginning of my ridiculous acts to follow.

What can I do?
Signed, Floundering Freshman

Dear Floundering,
So, you're the legendary stair-flight runner I've been hearing so much about. I just thought you were late for racketball class.

Anyway, if you haven't noticed, not many freshman do have a clue until at least semester's end, so I wouldn't feel too bad. At least you realize the problem!

My advice to you is, in the future, think before you act. This is something not many people here do, regardless of age.

Your main problem is that you are a freshman, so you're pretty much stuck with your foolishness until you are a sophomore. Just learn to live with it.

All I can say is, hang in there and good luck. And remember, keep walking down the hall and through the doors, those are the stairs you're looking for.

Dear Readers,
I know this problem is not an uncommon one, so if you're troubled, confused, bored...please write me and hopefully I can shed some light on your troubles. You can drop it off at the Argonaut, 3rd floor of the SUB.

some of it to what I did. I tell you, I ate a lot of peanut butter and jelly sandwiches this summer."

The work ethic that Valero spreads to his players started when he tried to walk on at Boise State University in 1978. Then coach Jim Criner told him that his 5-foot-11, 223 pound frame wasn't big enough to play and that he was wasting his time.

The only problem was that Valero wasn't taking no for an answer. He answered the critics by lasting for four years and eventually being named captain as a senior. He also played on the 1980 BSU National Championship team.

"I saw a lot of players come and go when I was here," Valero said. "I don't care how slow, weak or what you are, you just have to have a big heart. You can never take no for an answer."

Valero used the same desire when he was seeking the Idaho job before the 1990 season. The year before he coached under Mike Sheppard at the University of New Mexico on a team that finished dead last in the Western Athletic Conference. Sheppard in turn fired his whole coaching staff, leaving Valero without a job. He wanted the vacant Idaho offensive line coaching job bad.

"To tell you the truth, we weren't really interested in him at all," Smith said. "We were looking at former Idaho player Tom Cable and another guy from (The University of) Montana and we thought we'd choose one of them."

Valero wanted the job so bad that he drove himself to Moscow for an interview and paid all his own expenses. He interviewed once and Smith was so impressed he was called back for a second.

"After that interview we hired him," Smith said. "He basically sold himself to us. I liked the way he talked technique and thought he'd fit in well with our program."

Since coming to Idaho, Valero has totally revolutionized the Vandals weight program. Before Valero the team had a workout that was nearly the same for every player. Every player now has his workout computerized. The system is designed to fit each player's individual needs. A simple print out can tell what each player is doing.

"The system is great because any weakness a player has can be targeted and worked on," Smith said. "We don't have to waste time."

Just to see how mentally deranged I really am, I went to the Student Counseling Center and had a chat with Clinical Psychologist Laurie Wilson. First, she felt many of the people who wear this stuff are frustrated former athletes. People want to identify with pro athletes. She also felt it gives people their identity and puts them into a particular status group.

"No matter what you think, the first impression a person has about you is developed from what you are wearing," Wilson said. "It's a status symbol. People want to be associated with a winner."

Maybe that's why the Raiders sell more paraphernalia than any other team in professional sports. Over the last 25 years the Raiders have an 80-plus winning percentage. They have the NFL market cornered. According to Greg Garton, who runs the official Raiders pro shop in El Segundo, Calif., the Raiders sell over 28.7 percent of the NFL products. In fact the top five NFL teams, in terms of sales, sell over 64 percent of paraphernalia. At least the NFL and NBA keep things under control by splitting the money equally between all the teams.

The sale of Raider stuff is getting out of hand. The colors are black and silver and according to Garton, many gangs and celebrity's wear it because it represents a tough image. Take a look at rap videos. Everyone from Public Enemy to Ice-T wear it all over their bodies.

"Many minorities, especially blacks and hispanics that are in gangs wear the stuff because black is a neutral color," Garton said. "They also like it because the black represents a tough guy image."

Many Los Angeles schools are banning Raider paraphernalia, because they say it represents a bad element. This is ridiculous. Society's problems are rooted a little deeper than in a Raider t-shirt. Garton said the Raider organization is trying to promote the image people should enjoy the Raiders because of their commitment to excellence, not because they represent something evil. The problem is many people associate the Raiders with gangs as much as with a pro football team.

"Have a good time, enjoy yourself. If you start spending your book money to buy a hat or beating somebody over the head because they said something bad about your team, then you have a problem," Wilson said

Chris Gatewood is the Sports Editor of the Argonaut. His column runs every Friday

The Vandals split with Gonzaga last season and this spring, Coach Hilbert is confident the Vandals will do better this weekend.

"I feel confident that we will play with them, our kids always get fired up for this game," Hilbert said.

The Huskies aren't relying on one player as much as Gonzaga. Washington will bring a well rounded, yet young team, to battle with the Vandals.

"The University of Washington team is loaded with studs. Every single position is filled with a big-time, blue-chip player," Hilbert said.

Washington defeated the Vandals last spring, but Hilbert doesn't feel spring is a good indication of how a team will round out the season.

Washington will also bring a lot of youth onto the court, as do the Vandals. Hilbert hopes to use this as a positive factor rather than negative.

"I want to capitalize on their youth and I hope that keeps us in some games," Hilbert said.

Second-year player Jessica Puckett feels the Vandals are prepared for a weekend of intense play.

"Washington is a really good team with a quick offense. If we go in there controlled, with a strong defense and intimidating we'll do well. Puckett said.
