Soldier gives talk on Gulf War experience

By ALISA STOFFEL
Staff Writer

Captain Richard Dale Storr, an A-10 pilot who was shot down during the Persian Gulf War and held as a prisoner of war for 33 days, spoke at the Air Force ROTC Dining-In Saturday evening.

Storr was stationed at England Air Force Base in Alexandria, Louisiana when the war started. On Aug. 26, 1990, Storr got his marching orders.

"You knew it was coming, but you didn't know," Storr said.

Those who were activated had three days to pack. They traveled to Myrtle Beach and stayed over night. The next day they flew a 14-hour mission to Saudi Arabia, refueling nine times, usually at night.

"As soon as we landed, the threat that Saddam was going to come south was so great that they started loading up the planes with Mavericks (missiles)," Storr said.

Because no base existed in Saudi Arabia, troops had to build everything they needed. Supplies were limited, and the basics of life had to be wrought from the sand-covered desert. The troops spent a lot of their time filling sand bags to make bunkers. The fact that whomever was contracted to make the sandbags produced biodegradable bags made the job even more difficult. Every three months the bags broke down, and the bunker was reduced to the original pile of sand it started out as. Maintenance crews worked in 12-hour shifts on the bunkers. The job was supposed to take four months. It took five weeks.

Sandstorms were a part of everyday life, as was the 100-degree sun glaring off the white talcum like sand. The answer to the blowing dust was pavement.

"They put black asphalt down everywhere. If it didn't move, they paved it," Storr said.

On the first day of the war, Storr and the other pilots received their mission orders.

The pilots had practiced for six months to go after tanks. They were expecting to go after tanks. But their orders said — go after radar sites.

"You come up with your own tactics, you improvise, you adapt," Storr said.

The sites had to be taken out before the later flights could safely come in without the Iraqis knowing it. For the mission, the group was to use special ammunition — the Maverick G-model. They had never used or practiced with this model before.

"We had no idea how to use it. They gave us a 20-minute video on how to use it the day before the war started. We popped it in the machine and then we were on our way," Storr said.

The squadron flew an average of three missions a day. They "drove through" the base to refuel and re-arm in 15 minutes between missions.

Fraternal hazing goes on trial

By SHARI IRETON
Staff Writer

Hazing is the worst part of the brother/sisterhood because it's at someone else's expense," said Dave Westol at a hazing presentation Sunday night.

Westol, the Executive Director of Theta Chi Fraternity, presented Hazing on Trial on behalf of the Sigma Alpha Epsilon Fraternity. The fraternity, according to SAE president Mike Lincoln, was required by the university to have Westol come and speak.

Westol is a member of the Michigan State University Theta Chi chapter, a chapter that he said participated in hazing.

"I was convinced hazing was the way to go and I was one of the worst hazers in my chapter," said Westol.

Westol, a former assistant prosecuting attorney, took the audience through a hypothetical situation involving a hazing chapter.

The audience was to think of themselves as "John," the president of fictitious Gamma Nu Pi, who condones hazing in his fraternity. "Mike" was the trusting freshman who was "entering something bigger than himself" in Westol's story of the horrors of hazing.

After bid night, the pledges in this make-believe story begin to notice unfairness in the chapter. Questions as to why only pledges have to clean the house or why pledges have to enter the back door are brought before "John." Westol said that these complaints are all too common in many chapters around the country.

"Work sessions are fine if everyone is involved," he said. He also said that pledge class unity is "stupid because it justifies hazing" and when he hears the phrase "pledge class unity," he knows there is hazing.

During the Gamma Nu

Pi hypothetical "Hell Week," Westol informed the audience of some hazing practices that have occurred in chapters around the country. Sleep deprivation, calisthenics and morning fun runs in front of the sororities were all conducted by what he called "frat cowards" of the hazing chapters.

Westol said that a hazing chapter should advertise and tell pledges three things to prepare them for what awaits:

- Be prepared for a lot of garbage.
- Always say, 'I love the fraternity.'
- Never think.

Continuing the story, the Gamma Nu Pi pledges were convinced during Hell Week by "John" that they were going to be initiated, but this is only a fake initiation.

"How do we develop honesty by lying?" asked Westol. He has heard many hazing chapters say that honesty is an important

Alcohol poisoning causes student death

By KALISTA BARCLAY
Asst. News Editor

A 22-year-old student died early Friday morning of alcohol poisoning. This is the third student alcohol-related death on campus in the last two weeks.

Alan Matthew Brodwater, a senior majoring in accounting and finance from Coeur d'Alene was pronounced dead at 2 a.m. Friday morning after his roommates found him unconscious and no longer breathing in his apartment.

According to witnesses, Brodwater had consumed a large quantity of alcohol on the evening of Oct. 31, including a quart of Southern Comfort liquor. His roommates helped him to bed and checked on him periodically. About 1 a.m. his roommates discovered that he was not breathing and called 911.

The Moscow Police Department received the call at 1:11 a.m. and officers arrived at the apartment at 106 South Lilley a minute later. The officers began CPR until medical units could arrive at the scene. Emergency Medical Technicians arrived shortly and continued CPR until the ambulance arrived.

Brodwater was taken to Gritman Memorial Hospital, where he pronounced dead by Latah County Coroner Dr. Andrew Saueracker. According to Saueracker the official cause of death was determined as "acute alcohol poisoning." Saueracker was unable to release the blood alcohol level of the victim but said that it was "quite high, a lethal

Cultural fair adds diversity

Cultural Diversity Week started Monday and will continue through Friday with events including speakers, movies, and fairs.

"I hope everyone takes advantage of the events," said Amtul Sheikh, ASUI Senator. "It's great that the ASUI is putting this together. The University of Idaho is so diverse, we can all learn from each other."

Events began Monday night with Larry Echohawk, Idaho's Attorney General. Echohawk is the first Native American in United States history to hold a major state office.

From 11 a.m. to 3 p.m. today, a food fair will be held in the SUB Ballroom. C. Shaw spreads knowledge, fun

Analysis by DORI MALINOFF
Staff Writer

When I heard that the Political Concerns Board was sponsoring a speaker, believe me, my heart did not exactly skip a beat. When I heard that he was a magician as well as a politician, my interests were raised a little, but nevertheless, this was still just an assignment that I was covering. No big deal, right? Wrong! For a person who has never been politically motivated and has never had any plans to, I must admit that this was one of the most worthwhile lectures I've ever attended.

I watched, mesmerized, I listened to Mr. C. Shaw Smith, and became inspired by his sense of humor and outlook on life. Looking at other people's expressions and listening to their responses afterward, I realized that I was not the only one.

Smith introduced himself as being from Davidson, North Carolina, which, as he put it, is "not the end of the world, but you can see it from there." Nevertheless, as the former Director of Student Services at North Carolina State University, he has gained insight into contemporary philosophies and attitudes among college students. This contact along with his own life experiences make him the whimsical orator that he is.

Part of Smith's ability to captivate audiences stems from his training as a magician. While he discussed matters of personal concern and those of global significance, he performed amusing illusory tricks to accompany his theories. For instance, in discussing his primary theory that "everything in life is connected," by displaying a magical illusion, he revealed that everything we do now paves the way for what we will do later, although we can't see it and don't know it yet.

In his years of dealing with college students, Smith has observed that many of us are not sure that what we're doing makes any sense, except trying to get good grades. In telling us that we have the chance to change things now, he hoped to make us realize that taking the initiative now can set the course for which path our life will take later.

Smith did not come, however, merely to just drop idealistic pearls of wisdom upon a gaping audience. He also offered many realistic interpretations of the world we live in. He noted that there are incredible contradictions in our society. Yet, he offered positive solutions to what we see and hear in everyday life. When faced with homelessness vs. wealth and violence vs. peace, we can voice opinions and make an impact.

He referred to the student movement in the '60s as an example. Although they might have wanted to tear up the world, out of this anger and resentment, they unseated the president of the U.S., stopped the war, and put morality and ethics into the business world. If we could have an ounce of this commitment now, he believed, students could once again have an influence upon administrators and other elected officials. As he introduced himself, Smith said, "I have no talent—just nerve." It is this risk factor that hinders many people from reaching their full potential, in his opinion.

Other factors that affect what a person will do, Smith explained, has to do with their values system. Many people feel that paying $20,000 a year for a college education just to read and then sit and think about what they read is a waste of money. However, this can be looked at in another light. Some might say that if one doesn't try to think about where they are, one will stay where they are.

Among his other observations were those of special people. Smith believes that heroes are found in the most unlikely circumstances. He gave the example of an experiment that St. John's University did in New York City. Each year, it makes its teachers instruct one course in a subject outside of their specialty. What they've found is that those instructors who get the highest evaluation are the ones who are teaching something they're not familiar with. In this circumstance, the teacher and the student learn together.

On day 17 of the war, Storr was shot down over Kuwait. His plane was shot at 10,000 feet, and the steering controls were destroyed. At 1000 feet, Storr got into eject position and bailed out through the smoke-ball of his exploding plane.

On the ground, Iraqis drove up to the uninjured pilot. Their first question was if he had any food.

In the next month, Storr was transported to various prisons. Meantime everyone thought he was killed in the wreck.

Then, American forces bombed the building Storr was in. After the walls collapsed, the guards scattered and the American prisoners exchanged names. It was at this time that Storr discovered his memorial service in the United States had already occurred.

On March 5, Storr joined 14 other American prisoners.

"I couldn't believe that we were going home," Storr said.

Back home, Storr shares his experiences with various groups. He also shares a few practical lessons he learned while imprisoned.

But most importantly, Storr has learned the true value of freedom.

"You've got something here worth fighting for and worth dying for. If I had to do this all over again, I would. Tomorrow."

quality in a member.

At the end of his story, Westol reminded the students of the tragedy of hazing by having the prospective pledge "Mike" die from drowning in his own vomit.

Westol went on to say that Hell Week has nothing to do with brotherhood and has everything to do with manipulation. He encouraged IFC to "be as tough as they can be."

After emotionally hazing many brothers in his fraternity, Westol spoke with experience as he told the students that mental hazing is worse than any kind of physical hazing.

"I think it's great to have her (Leader Charge) here," said Amy Anderson, ASUI Senator. "Many students have seen the film and now they'll have a chance to talk to her."

Also on Wednesday, arts and crafts from various cultures will be shown from 11 a.m. to 9 p.m. in the SUB Vandal Lounge. Native Americans from the Coeur d'Alene and Nez Perce tribes will sell paintings, beadwork, and jewelry.

According to ASUI President Mike Gotch, the week could not have been planned without the student cultural organizations.

"All of the ideas for events came from the groups participating," said Gotch. "It wasn't just the ASUI sitting around and coming up with ideas."

Thursday at 7 p.m., Gun Gun Hon Chen will be shown in the SUB Borah Theatre. This award-winning Chinese film is a wartime love story, and is free to the public.

Cultural Diversity Week closes with the film Fraternity, showing at 7 p.m. Friday in the SUB Borah Theatre. This film explores the relationship between brothers and is also free to the public.

Art show in progress

By CHRISTIAN THOMPSON
Staff Writer

The annual Master of Fine Arts Review Exhibition is being presented at the University Art Gallery at Ridenbaugh Hall through Wednesday. This annual event is a chance for graduate students to show their artwork.

All of the pieces exhibited are work in progress. They are examples of what the artist is developing, giving them a chance to present their new ideas and get feedback from faculty and colleagues.

The exhibit is not based on one medium, but includes black and white photography, oil on canvas and paper, acrylic, clay, graphite and video.

The students choose the pieces that are presented, and selection is not necessarily based on the grades they have received for them in classes. For many students, these are examples of their exploration and development.

This year's exhibition includes the following graduate students: Kristen Smith, Jennifer Rod, Mark Lamoreaux, Steve K. Fox, Gail Siegel, Enid Crawford, Fred Deibel, Elena Watson, Lonnie Hutson, Debbie Fucchin-gensen, Kellie Jo Risk, Marty Fromm, and Rick Johnson.

The Gallery's hours are Monday through Wednesday from 9-6, Thursday from 11-5, Friday from 9-6, and Saturday from 12-5.

Convention covers more than the basics

This weekend in Colorado was very enlightening for the Argonaut editorial staff that made the trip to Denver. We learned that compared to the rest of the country, we have a very good relationship with our administration and our student government, that we have rights we never before knew existed, and that we are one of the top five non-daily college newspapers.

The Associated Collegiate Press conference that we attended this weekend — that all you students financed by the way, so thank you — brought together over 1,700 students from 220 schools nationwide, a rather impressive gathering of aspiring journalists and future media leaders. Our goal was to improve our technical writing and production skills and to bring this knowledge home to our staff.

However, we learned a lot more than just the basics from this experience.

We learned that any so-called problems that anyone has with us are minor compared to the problems that other newspapers cause and create for their universities, their student governments, and their community in general. We heard horror stories of slanderous and libelous articles that went way beyond mentioning cockroaches or high prices, parodies of faculty members and student leaders that were not only embarrassing but also degrading, and stereotypical as well as racist printed language that made us cringe.

We also learned that we have the right to print almost anything we want, as long as we are within our legal rights, and that no one — not the Administration, not the Senate — can take this right away from us. It's called the First Amendment, and it affords us the privilege to print what we see fit. The United States Supreme Court has upheld this right of college papers in over 60 cases, establishing the fact that a university (or any student-empowered branch) cannot shut down, stop or reduce funding because of a content disagreement. That is called CENSORSHIP, and it is illegal.

So ... are we going to go crazy and print everything we hear and everything we have ever wanted to print (ie. naked streakers)? How about personal attacks and libelous statements? We've got a lawyer to save us.

Does this mean that we had better get with it and start being a little more controversial, or at least create some controversy?

No, I don't think so. I think this means that we have tact, and taste, and standards, and a code of ethics that we follow, and that this is not likely to change.

A newspaper's job is to report the facts in an objective manner, to persuade individuals through diverse editorials, to spread accurate and timely information, and to act as a conduit of communication between readers.

This is our duty and we try to do it the best we can. If you don't like the way we're doing it, write us a letter and tell us why.

We're not the only ones that the First Amendment's freedom of expression protects.

Other alternatives to drinking

Editor;

The October 22nd editorial was in reference to drinking alternatives, however the only alternative implied was a safer place than Robinson Lake to go drinking. I'd like to hear from students who feel obliged to obey the age restrictions on alcohol and yet have found alternatives for a good time. All of the humor, fun and creativity on this campus didn't come to a halt when the drinking age was raised to 21. However, the Argonaut doesn't reflect this.

Five pages were devoted to the Vandals and the arts, but that addresses only a small segment of the numerous, spontaneous, inexpensive, ways students have a good time on a daily basis. For the rest of the semester, I'll donate $20 a week to the Argonaut, or a student for a letter or column describing alternatives to getting drunk for fun.

There are so many hilarious activities going on from those zany games of chase through the trees, to flamboyant gatherings ala art decor and crepe paper.

Health services deserves more attention

I want to make it clear, before I begin with yet another rant against the system (that nebulous entity), that I am very much impressed with the staff at the student health center, and all the feelings I have toward them are ones of great respect, and in a couple of strep throat cases, forever-indebtedness. The health care professionals are sensitive, understanding and helpful.

That is one of the reasons I feel moved enough to expound upon the topic of the health center being crowded, and obviously less fortunate in the area of university monetary favor than other programs.

Take for instance the ASUI Senate, a program that I have heard evidently has the funds to debate the issue of whether or not phone stickers should be on the dorm telephones. I am not implying that the sticker issue is not important, or less important than the health center issue, I am just wondering where the university's priorities lie.

Doesn't nearly everyone know the emergency number 911? I am not trying to be ethnocentric or anything here, but I think most people are aware that this number is the one to call if circumstances are so bad that they cannot be dealt with with common household remedies. It seems that funding could be more thoughtfully allocated in this case.

MEYLA BIANCO
COMMENTARY

It occurs to me that if sympathies are really for the students, and for the university employees, that the health center would be a more magnetic receptacle for funds. After all, if we do not have our health, what do we have? Long waits, tired health care professionals, and a waiting room full of magazines dating from 1981.

Since the lobby of the health center is always so full (and believe me, there are always more people than you want to see in your sickly state), there is always a line. A long one; the word serpentine comes to mind. Since there is always a line, the staff is always somewhat harried, and it is obvious that they are always working hard. I think that these nurse practitioners, doctors, and all other staff deserve a more contemporary facility to work in since they provide such a truly indispensable service to students: keeping us healthy.

I would be willing to surmise that nearly every student at the UI has had some positive contact with the health center, or has a friend who has. If this continued quality health care is to go on unfettered, equally accessible and cost effective to all, I think everyone reading this column should at least appreciate and realize the worth of the health

Responsibility lies upon irresponsible party

Editor:
This letter is in reference to your "Drinking alternatives" comment in Tuesday's Argonaut (10-22-91). You mentioned some things I can agree with, one of which was that the decision to drink and drive is poor judgement. But you also asked "...can the blame (for Scott Mondahl's unfortunate accident) be directed to another source, possibly a hierarchical form?" It's not likely. I'm tired of people not taking responsibility for their actions. We have brains, this means we can think through possible courses of events before they happen. If one of your family members happened to be one of the many innocent people who get clobbered to death by drunk drivers, I'm not too sure you would walk up to the accused, pat him on the back and say "It's okay, it's not your fault, it's those hierarchical bastards."

People have to try pretty damn hard to be more irresponsible than driving drunk. I see alot of the "See Dick drink, see Dick drive, see Dick die" shirts. I honestly care much less for the Dicks than the innocent people they kill on the road. As far as I'm concerned, the "hierarchical forms" can send all the Dick's to GMC to use for crash test dummies. I know more than one mother who has lost a child to a Dick that would readily agree with me.

I have no idea if Scott Mondahl's fate was met by a Dick. But if it was, why don't you suggest that he call the Mondahl's in Oregon and explain to them that those darn "hierarchical forms" didn't give him a place to get drunk so the accident wasn't his fault. I'm sure they'd be real open to hearing that about now.

The bottom line is we've all got to be responsible for our actions. Shifting responsibility to others in drunk driving accidents is just plain childish thinking. You're absolutely right in saying people are going to drink no matter what the legal age is, I agree with that. But people are always going to drive drunk as well, no matter what the laws dictate. I myself don't want to be caught on a road in front of a Dick.

More responsible thinking might have prevented the accident on Robinson Lake Road, not alternatives of which you spoke.

Blaming government is wrong

Editor:
I am writing in response to the editor's opinion on the death of U of I student, Scott Mondahl. I believe the main point has been neglected here, and it is what I want to focus on now.

The death of Scott Mondahl was a tragedy, and one that could have been avoided, I agree. But to blame the government and the laws stipulating who can and cannot drink is wrong. The drinking age law is just that.. a law. Each of us, individually, bears the responsibility to obey the laws which govern us- not to find a way around them or use them as an excuse for a senseless, tragic accident that could possibly been avoided if the laws pertaining to underage drinking had been obeyed. You may feel the legal drinking age should be lowered to 19, but the fact is the legal age is currently 21, and to ask the university to provide, and allow an illegal drinking atmosphere

Misinformation causes false view of loggers

Editor:
I found your article "Time is now to think about forests" to be personally offensive and full of false accusations.

First, I challenge you to find a single logger whose goal in life is to cut down every standing tree and kill every spotted owl in his path. No logger would deliberately ruin his own workplace for (as you put it) economic comfort. Coming from a logging family, I guarantee that this so called comfort that you are referring to is not being felt by the logger and his family. The timber industry is full of men and women busting their ass every day just trying to

Instructors should be evaluated more often Gambino's prices not high

Editor;

We as students take an average of three tests each semester, and these tests reflect our learning and our performance throughout each semester. Instructors are also evaluated by students at the end of each semester when we fill out the evaluation forms. One of the main objectives of these evaluations is to assist the instructors in developing better teaching techniques.

Unfortunately, there are some problems with the current evaluation process which makes the above objectives less tangible:

1) The benefits of these evaluations, such as how an instructor can improve his or her teaching, do not go to the students who are currently taking that course because these forms are given at the end of the semester.

2) The results of these evaluations are only relevant to that semester. An instructor's method of teaching or the class circumstances may change. Therefore, the results of these evaluations may not be applicable to future semesters.

3) Many instructors either retire or are graduate students who are not going to continue teaching after the current semester. Therefore, evaluating them at the end of the semester is pointless.

4) The majority of students who complete these evaluation forms do not include constructive thoughts to their content, mainly because they know that these evaluations have no impact on the quality of teaching which they have been receiving. By that time, the semester is basically over (and some even say thank heavens that it is over).

To overcome the above problems and to maintain a good and

Editor;

In response to the Bar & Restaurant Guide's review of the "Gambino's food good, prices to high" article, we would like to enlighten the author of a few of our own opinions.

First of all, Gambino's has been serving the Palouse for 13 years with incredible Italian specialties, great service, and friendly atmosphere. Where else in the Moscow/Pullman area can you find the same food, both quantity and quality, for those prices? You can't.

If you believe the prices are too high, then answer this: why do college students flock to Gambinos every lunch and dinner hour, especially on weekends, and why are they willing to wait in line for Pop's pizza and all-famous fishbowls?

For those people who have never stepped foot in Gambino's, we hope that they are not influenced by Bianco's unfounded critique. But for those unfortunate individuals who have not yet experienced the Gambino's tradition, try it for yourself, you'll be back for more.

Pop's we love you! Keep up the good work.

SPECIAL REPORT: The State of Women's Athletics Women struggle for equality

By CHRISTOPHER GATEWOOD
Sports Editor

The saying goes, "All men are created equal." But Thomas Jefferson obviously wasn't thinking about women when the Constitution was drawn up. Women have been treated like second-class citizens for much of our country's history and in athletics, things haven't been much different.

Sometime during the basketball season when the Vandal men have a night off go check out one of the women's games. The scene is quite different.

Yes, go to the Kibbie Dome and see a women's game. The sound of pins dropping is a nightly occurrence. There are funerals with livelier crowds. A stark contrast to the rabid, sold-out crowds that have seen the men win 69 games over the last three years. Do Vandal fans even know there are women's sports?

"It's hard for me to judge women's sports, because I've never been to a women's sporting event," said Jarred Blankenship, a 23-year-old student. "I think there might be more interest if there was more coverage and publicity."

The publicity is there; problem is, nobody notices. Over the generations, society has become tacitly numb to the fact that men's sports are the only ones that count. Look at any sports page, women's sports are buried deep in the back. Look at our young people's sports heroes, they're mostly men.

Over time, everything changes, and though subtle, in the last 10 years women have made strides that have brought them closer to equality.

Horace Grant hauls in the rebound. He outlets the ball to Scottie Pippen, who dishes the more exciting," said Chauncey McBride of the men. "It's faster, there's lots of dunks and play isn't stopped as much."

When it comes to sports in America, people want their gratification fast and furious. This isn't lost on Laurie Turner, coach of the Vandal women. "It may be unfair, but it's reality," Turner said. "Men's games are what draws the crowds."

When watching a women's game it is important to keep things in perspective. No, women don't dunk, but they play just as hard as men, get just as intense as men and get just as emotional. Maybe more so.

"Yes, it's upsetting to play in front of small crowds, but I think sometimes we get more emotional," women's center Kelly Moller said. "The people that do watch us really like it once they see it. Our fans that do come are loyal."

Women's volleyball has a rule which make the game similar and maybe more exciting than the men's version. The nets are lower, which allow for the same high-flying spikes as the men's game. Volleyball may be the only sport in college athletics where men and women exist on

A miracle in Reno

The road to a championship isn't always paved by hard work, determination, and execution. Sometimes the road requires a little luck along the way.

Colorado's football team can attest to the fact. The Buffalos scored on fifth-down against Missouri last year as time ran out to win the Big-Eight Conference game. Had factors been a little different, Colorado would have lost the game and its share of the National Championship.

Saturday's Weber State-Nevada game in Reno could have a similar effect on determining this season's Big Sky Championship.

Going into the game, Nevada, the No. 1 ranked Division I-AA team, was the easy favorite. I figured playing on their home field the Wolf Pack wouldn't have any problems. It would be just another date in their final Big Sky season. Besides, Nevada had already beat their biggest threat, Boise State, the week before.

But as I sat watching the USC-Cal game, a halftime score flashed on the screen — Weber State 42, Nevada 14.

I was shocked, but elated. The No. 1 team was going to lose. The cocky team that I had to watch dance and sing in the Kibbie Dome bleachers with their fans after defeating Idaho was going to lose.

Later when I was at the Idaho Sports Information office, and the score had been confirmed legitimate, another score came in. This time it was Weber State 49-14 in the third-quarter. It sounded like it was over.

Not so fast, though.

Suddenly new reports started coming in. Nevada was mounting a comeback that was up to 49-27 by the end of the third-quarter. And everytime another update came, Nevada was one touchdown closer.

With only a couple of minutes to play Nevada had the ball on the Weber State 26 yard-line, trailing 49-41 — an eight point difference. That meant the Pack would need a two-point conversion to go to overtime if they did score.

My fingers were crossed as I waited for another update. When it came, it was good news. Nevada had scored but missed on the two-point conversion. The clock was under two minutes now and all Weber State had to do to preserve the upset was receive the kickoff safely and run the clock out.

Then the final report came. Nevada had recovered an on-side kick and scored a touchdown to pull-out the victory, 55-49.

Boise St. gets sweet revenge over UI

By SEV HONNESS
Staff Writer

Volleyball's head coach Tom Hilbert spelled it out plain and simple.

"Boise played very well and we let them," said Hilbert.

The Vandals' hopes for a play-off birth were dashed, but not entirely lost in the humbling that the Boise Broncos handed them this weekend.

The Vandals bowed in three straight games to an aggressive Boise offense and an unforgiving defense 6-15, 13-15 and 10-15.

The Broncos out hit Idaho with 60 kills to the Vandals 45; which is uncharacteristic for the usually potent front line.

"We couldn't run the middle because the pass was up in the air and they (Boise's blockers) camped on the outside hitters," said Jessica Puckett.

The fact that Idaho didn't pass well contributed to Boise's .367 hitting average that more than doubled the Vandals that could only manage a .180 hitting average.

"We ran no offense at all and when that happens it's hard to win," said Hilbert.

Puckett and McEwen usually rack up kill after kill and did get their share Saturday, but Boise ambushed and crippled the already ineffective offense causing Idaho to play catch-up virtually the entire match.

Idaho took a wake-up call in game two and led most of the way, but Boise rallied and overtook the Vandals, leaving them two down and a tough three games from winning.

Hilbert thought he may have had a chance to come back the way his team played tough in game two, but after reflecting on the match, thought he could have done some things different to give his netters more of an advantage.

"I should have gambled a bit on blocking," said Hilbert.

Although Hilbert felt that strategy may have helped, it was Idaho's lack of execution in other areas that made the difference.

"We weren't blocking as well as we could and we weren't playing defense," Heather McEwen said.

Only Puckett was in double-digits for digs with 10 and in the blocks category Idaho didn't produce what they had to in order to be successful.

"We didn't show up to play," said Amie Hanks. "We didn't control the ball and we were a step behind them all night long."

Hilbert thought his troops did come to play, but were overcome with Boise's aggressive style of play.

"Going into that match we were ready to play," said Hilbert, "But Boise came out gunning."

A big difference from the last time Idaho and Boise played, when Idaho defeated the Broncos at home, was that Boise scored the majority of transition (earned) points. They racked up nine to Idaho's three.

Transition points can set the tone of a match and in Hilbert's opinion Idaho never really got into a rhythm.

Although Idaho is in an unsavory position in regards to post-season play, they can still make the play-offs if a number of things take place.

If Boise drops two or three of their final league matches then Idaho could take over sole possession of fourth place.

But if Idaho wins their last three matches, Boise only has to lose one and they more than likely will in that Boise plays second place Northern Arizona twice.

Idaho would have to knock off first place Montana in that scenario.

In another case, if the University of Nevada finishes ahead of Eastern Washington University than Boise and Idaho tie. A strict criteria would then put Idaho in fourth and the Vandals would attend the Big Sky tournament.

Porter, the jock, finds her favorite sport

By SEV HOINESS
Staff Writer

Vandal volleyball player Dee Porter epitomizes the word "jock," though she would deny it. Porter plays volleyball with an intensity that few can muster.

Porter is a state of Idaho product. She first attended Cambridge High School, and then with nine weeks left in her junior year, Porter and her mother moved half-an-hour down the road to Weiser, where she completed her high school career.

At Weiser High School, Porter continued her dominance of women's A-2 athletics in volleyball, basketball, and track.

Oddly enough, volleyball wasn't the sport Porter received most of her accolades in; basketball was her claim to fame. Her list of honors is long and impressive.

In Porter's senior year of basketball she was the A-2 player of the year, Converse All-American, a member of the Gatorade Circle of Champions, Idaho Player of the Year, and the USA Today Women's Athlete of the Year for the state of Idaho, the latter encompassing all of her sports.

During Porter's first two years at Cambridge she led the basketball team to state championships and at Weiser they were runners-up in an overtime loss in which Porter sat out the overtime period after fouling out.

Porter was recruited to play basketball by the likes of Rice University, Colorado University and Stanford University, but had already verbally committed to the University of Idaho.

"I wanted to stay in-state," said Porter, "and be a representative of Idaho."

Porter's decision to play volleyball over basketball was simply a matter of liking volleyball better.

In a strange twist of fate, Porter met a teammate to be, Jessica Puckett, the summer of her junior year in high school.

Puckett and Porter are now young talents and a force to be reckoned with in the revived Idaho volleyball program.

Porter also was a stand out trackster, running the 1600 meter relay, sprint medley relay, 300 meter hurdles, and 100 meter hurdles. Porter also was either a state champion or runner-up in all these events.

Porter's volleyball endeavors were less spectacular in terms of team achievement; instead, she stood out individually.

The Cambridge volleyball squad placed fifth, third and won the championship during Porter's freshmen, sophomore, and junior years respectively. Porter carried Weiser's team to state, but didn't place while earning All-State honors.

Porter's social life at both Cambridge and Weiser suffered because of athletics. In her spare time she found herself renting movies and just hanging out.

Porter is presently a General Studies major, but plans to change that to an English Education major with a minor in Coaching.

Porter found herself in a familiar place this summer during her job — in the gym playing volleyball.

"I worked 10 camps, eight for Hilbert and two for UW (University of Washington)," said Porter.

Porter's future goals are reminiscent of her childhood. Porter would like to stick with the small town atmosphere she grew up in but still have the benefits of a larger city nearby.

"I want to live in a town just a little bigger than Weiser, maybe 30 miles from a big city," said Porter.

In the nearer future she holds lofty goals for the Vandal netters.

"I can see us winning the Big Sky my junior year and just going from there," said Porter.

Porter's teammates respect her volleyball talents as well as her personality.

"On the court she's intense and want's to win," said Heather McEwen, Porter's teammate, "Off the court she's a lot of fun." Idaho's head Volleyball coach Tom Hilbert attributes a large portion of Idaho's versatility to Porter's athletic ability.

"Over all balance, she's a great server, passer, can set, block and allows us ball control," said Hilbert.

It figured. If any team can comeback, it's Nevada, and playing in Reno makes it that much more likely.

But aside from any luck, Nevada has someone that seems to have a knack for comebacks — quarterback Chris Vargas.

Vargas is second string behind Fred Gatlin, but when Nevada is in trouble he is the man Ault goes to.

Vargas is the guy that came off the bench last year as a freshman against Idaho to throw the game-tying touchdown as time ran out, sending the game into overtime where Nevada won 31-28. The game went a long ways in deciding the Big Sky Championship.

In the same season he also engineered overtime comebacks in the I-AA playoffs against Furman and Boise State, helping to get Nevada to the championship game.

Saturday against Weber State the game wasn't in the I-AA playoffs, and it didn't go into overtime. But it was a crucial situation for Nevada's No. 1 ranking and Big Sky title hopes.

Vargas responded. He came in and completed 22 of 38 passes for 346 yards, two touchdowns, and no interceptions, while running for a third touchdown.

And the 41-point rally he directed overcame a 35-point third-quarter deficit, breaking the old NCAA comeback record of 33 points set in 1984 when Salisbury State rallied from being down 33-0 to Randolph-Macon to win 34-33.

A pretty impressive day for a reliever that is only a sophomore.

Now all that stands between Nevada and an undefeated season are road trips to Montana and Northern Arizona. Both are games Nevada will be favored to win.

But if things look bad, and reports come in that Nevada is losing, don't write it off if it's 35 points or less. Not when Chris Vargas will be on the sideline waiting to perform.

Tom Bithel is an Argonaut sports writer. His column will run every other Tuesday.

SPORTS REPORTS

■ BASKETBALL — The University of Idaho basketball team held its first inter-squad scrimmage this past Sunday in Memorial Gym, and Vandals Coach Larry Eustachy says his team is about where he expected at this point in the pre-season.

"We are in extremely poor condition right now but that's no surprise because we don't have a pre-season conditioning program," Eustachy said. "The regular season is so long that I don't like to do too much before we can start practice on October 15."

Eight players scored in double figures during three 15-minute sessions, with sophomore Orlando Lightfoot leading the way with 21 points including two three-pointers for the black squad. Seniors Terrell Malone and Fred Lovett added 16 points each as the black won two of the three games. Sophomore Deon Watson had 16 points and 15 rebounds and senior Otis Mixon added 13 and 12 respectively. Junior point guard Scott Matthews had 19 points and also hit two three-pointers.

The Vandals will open their schedule a week from Thursday on Nov. 12, when they play Simon Fraser in Memorial Gym at 7:30 p.m.

Tips for snow driving

By MATT LAWSON
Editor

As winter quickly approaches the Palouse, the thought of winter driving has crept into the back of the minds of several students.

For some incoming freshmen and transfers it may be the first taste of a real winter they have witnessed.

And Moscow winters are one of a kind.

Students face the bone-chilling winds that bring about sub-zero temperatures, but more significantly, the potential of endless amounts of snowfall.

After a weak winter last year for the most part, University of Idaho students should prepare for the worst this season and recent cold temperatures are a good preview of what is to come.

This snow creates a problem for drivers and overcoming it can come with simple knowledge of basic techniques to avoid problems.

Speed is always a significant factor in most automobile accidents and those happening in the winter are no exception. The best speed to travel is about 5-10 miles under the actual speed limit posted. It is hard to believe actually how much five miles per hour less can effect the chance of an accident occurring.

Along with adjusting speed, the driver must also take into consideration the distance between the car in front and the car one is driving. Suggested actual distance between two cars — in regular driving conditions — is two seconds. In bad weather this measure should be increased to at least three seconds, if not four or five.

Lower speeds and increased distance between cars can help prevent accidents, but they are still likely to occur. If a car does stop in front of you and an immediate stop is unavoidable, the way you administer your brakes may save a serious accident. Whatever you do, don't slam on the brakes no matter how close the car is. This will only initiate a uncontrolled slide and may result in a serious accident. The best way to apply the breaks is in a pumping manner, repeating the process over and over until coming to a stop. Don't try to swerve

REMEMBER!

1. Drive 5-10 mph slower
2. Increase distance between cars
3. Don't slam on your brakes, pump them
4. Use snow tires and chains
5. WEAR YOUR SEATBELT!!!

or it may result in a slide that may bring more than two cars into the accident.

If you must drive a truck or a light car, adding weight is highly suggested and snow tires, or chains is a must.

All the preventions in the world can be taken when driving in the winter, but statistics show accidents will inevitably happen.

So ... the only preventative measure that can actually help you is buckling your seat belt and, if you can, avoid driving altogether.

Car care shouldn't take a back seat

By SEV HOINESS
Staff Writer

Car care can be tedious, repetitious, and expensive, but as they say, those who have the most toys at the end wins.

But in this case, "those who have the most toys that 'run wins'" may fit better.

Good car maintenance starts with common sense.

If a person's car smells like burning oil, maybe they should check the oil dip stick. Yes, they might have to venture under the hood! Under the hood is a place some car owners have never seen.

Oil and oil filter changes should be administered about every 3,000 miles or six months according to most auto-care specialists. The engine is the heart of the car and dirty or stale oil can really shorten the life of an engine.

Other vital fluids that should be checked or replaced often are the water or anti-freeze, the brake fluid, and the windshield washer fluid.

Especially during the winter months the anti-freeze is vital to a cars survival in Idaho's harsh climate. If there is anti-freeze still in a car from last winter, it may not be good.

Any gas station will check the anti-freeze for a car owner and will replace it for the cost of the materials.

Brake fluid is important because if you don't have it, the car won't stop when the brakes are applied. One way to tell if a car owner's brake fluid is low is when the brakes are depressed, they feel mushy or soft. (Hint: That is also under the hood.)

While the weather is still relatively warm and the windshield washer fluid won't freeze to the windshield, it might help if there is actually cleaner in the windshield washer container.

Actually there is anti-freeze for the washer fluid, but it doesn't always work in extreme temperatures.

The engine is the heart, but if the battery doesn't turn it over the blood won't pump and the car owner walks.

"Unwanted odors always seem to creep up on car owners during the winter months causing passengers to lift their noses in disgust."

Heavy duty batteries are a must in sub-freezing weather. Again, any gas station would be happy to check the battery and even sell one at a usually inflated price.

Gas is usually the last thing to freeze, but it's been known to ice up and give a car owner big problems. Fuel anti-freeze is available, but can get expensive over the course of a winter. A suggestion in the use of fuel anti-freeze would be to watch the weather reports and anticipate cold spells as they come.

Not only the working parts of the car are abused during the winter, but the interior and exterior both absorb their share of punishment and neglect.

The paint job suffers rock chips and grimy dirt that scratch paint like sandpaper. These can both be prevented to an extent with a good coat of wax. Wax may be hard to apply in freezing temperatures, so a garage or warm day are optimal if wax is desirable.

Keeping the interior of a car clean during the winter is not an easy chore. Mud and various other items can be a big headache during the winter months.

Floor mats are advised and make clean-up much easier. Also, a trash bag can help keep the car from being cluttered with garbage and parking tickets.

Skiing paraphernalia can really beat-up the upholstery. Therefore, ski racks are recommended to cut down on wear and tear of the insides.

Unwanted odors always seem to creep up on car owners during the winter months causing passengers to lift their noses up in disgust.

A simple solution is the old stand-by, the Tree. Many other car fresheners are on the market and come in several convenient and effective methods. From stick-ups to scent drops, malodorous cars can be successfully combatted.

Winter takes a toll on cars, but with a little T.L.C. your car will make it through to the spring more gracefully.

Help when stranded

By JEFF KAPOSTASY
News Editor

Sometimes, all the car care in the world is not going to save you from fate. Warm, purring engines sometimes turn to cold, silent pieces of worthless metal. When this happens in Yukon-like weather, it's important to know what to do to beat the elements and remain alive.

If you plan on driving anywhere in the brutal cold this winter, especially to rural areas, it is wise to take precautions. Your well-being and health may depend on it.

For winter driving, always pack some thick blankets or extra coats before a drive in the Winter Wonderland. Other necessities include a flashlight, a map, gloves, and a portable radio. A CB radio, though rare these days and rather expensive, can also help the stranded motorist. These items are almost essential if a worst-case stranding occurs.

For instance, let's say your driving alone on a desolate highway when your car suddenly has its funeral. If you are very well-educated about cars, you may want to use the flashlight and peek under the hood. If this yields no more than cold fingers, get back into your car.

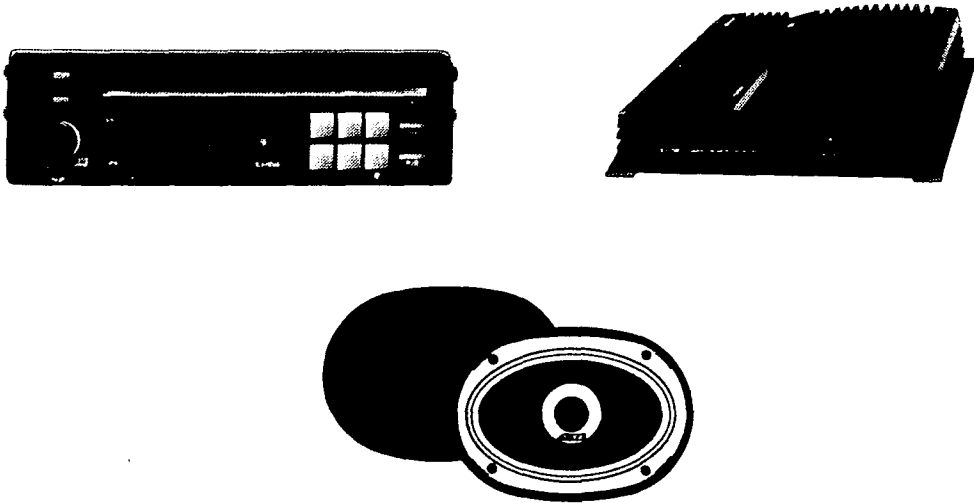

The worst thing to do in this situation is to hop out in the darkness and start walking aimlessly towards some imaginary help. This is probably the best way to get hypothermia, frost-bite, and other problems. The best thing to do is snuggle up in the blankets and keep warm. (This is best done if you're with someone of the opposite sex.) Keep your hazard lights on, and your radio tuned to the latest weather. It may also be a good idea to bring a canteen of water in case you're stranded for a long time. Chances are, help will come along and you'll be towed home in time for the football game.

Students need to look out when buying used cars

By STEVE CORDA
Asst. News Editor

Let's face it, college students are looking for a deal.

You just got your bank statement in the mail and the $1.94 check you wrote two weeks ago bounced. Now with a $15.00 overdraft fee, that Big Mac is going to cost $16.94. Add that to the AT&T bill you've put off paying for the last month. It's two weeks past midterms and for a lot of students, that means money problems.

The easiest solution to these money problems is to start selling off things that will get you some cash fast. The best solution is to get a part-time job. But that sub-zero, two mile walk to Safeway every day of the Moscow winter to put in your 30 hours a week could get just a little old. What if you are in a major that requires you get an internship? The company you work for will probably ask that you provide your own transportation. Sooner or later, you are going to need to own your own car.

Wonder why I'm rambling on so much? I'll tell you. You see, Argonaut writers are paid for every inch they write and everything I've written so far has taken up 5.9 inches. (Ching, Ching, go the cash registers.) Now, for the guys in my house that are still reading this, I'll get to the point.

Between the people that are trying desperately to make money fast, and the people who know a college student will probably buy anything with two bumpers and a horn if the price is right, Moscow, Idaho is starting to look the set of a Mad Max movie (except that this isn't a desert, and no one who lives here is nearly as handsome as Mel Gibson) with cars abandoned along the side of the road. Only these cars aren't for scrap; according to the signs taped up in the side or back windows, they're for sale. Many of them for insanely low prices.

I would say that the majority of people selling these vehicles are legitimate. Maybe they need some fast money, maybe they have a new car and want to get what they can for the old one, or maybe they are just tired of the thing. But a lot of people selling their used cars are trying to let someone else absorb the cost of a lemon that would otherwise cost them money. And a college student looking for a bargain makes the perfect chump.

If you are considering buying a used car that's being sold for less than a tenth of its original value, be more than a little cautious.

The best way to avoid the business end of a huge screwdriver is to know about cars. You can check the car over before buying it to avoid making a poor investment. Even if you put the "me" back into mechanic, you should have someone you trust look at the car also. Either a mechanic you trust, or a friend who knows about cars. Make sure it's a friend who really knows cars, not just someone who says they do.

Being sure the used car you buy is free of structural and motor damage will keep you from making the buy that keeps on costing you in repair or scrap costs.

Preparation key to success

RRRRRR click, click, RRRRRRRR click, click. Your car may sound like this and with luck it will eventually turn over in this freezing weather. Now that it's winter you'll have to do more than run out and jump in your car and drive away.

Unfortunately we can't pour hot coffee into our cars, like we do ourselves, but here are a few ways to make starting your car on those cold winter mornings a little easier and faster.

Here's an easy one. Keep at least a half a tank of gas in your car. This prevents condensation from occurring in your gas tank, therefore making it easier to start.

For that frozen windshield, a windshield scraper usually works the best, but in a bind, a tape or CD case will get the job done. Removing ice from your windshield can be a time consuming and laboring job. For those lazy people there are a few ways around this tedious task. Try putting a tarp, large garbage bag or towel over your windshield at night. Be sure to put the windshield cover underneath your windshield wipers and secure the ends. The easiest way to hold down the ends is to open the car doors, place the plastic in the open area between the car and the door and slam the door on the end of your windshield covering. When you get ready to leave there will be no scraping to do, just remove the cover.

"Your car will run better and cost less in repair bills if you start it earlier and give it a chance to warm up."

To make this whole cold morning business easier on yourself and your car, go out about 5-10 minutes before you want to leave and start your car. This will give the engine and the inside of your car a chance to warm up. If you turn on the defrost, your windshield should be melted by the time you are ready to leave, then instead of scraping you can just turn on the windshield wipers. Unless you enjoy riding in a cold car, turning on the heater is usually a good idea. You can skip the defrost step if you covered your windshield the night before and go straight to turning on the heater and getting back in the house to finish breakfast. Now that you've started the car go back inside and grab a doughnut and a cup of coffee. By the time you're finished with the doughnut your car should have a clear windshield and be ready to go.

For those of you who live in a sub-zero climate you can have an engine heater installed in your car and plug it in at night. This will ensure your car starting in the morning.

Your car will run better and will cost you less in repair bills if you start it earlier and give it a chance to warm up. Besides, you won't be one of those people who pull out onto the road, bring traffic to a 15-mile crawl while you wait for the heater to work, which doesn't get warm until you reach your destination, and your car moans all the way there while you ruin your oil pump.

This winter try to: (1) Cover the windshield of your car the night before. (2) 5-10 minutes before you want to leave go out and start your car. (3) Turn on the heater and/or defrost. (4) Come back in ten minutes and you'll be on your way in a warm and well running car.

Tires take pressure off rookie drivers

By MAREEN BARTLETT
 AND
 JIM VOLLBRECHT
 Managing and Photo Editors

This is the time of year when thoughts turn to Thanksgiving vacation, skiing, and getting to the bars for hot toddies. All three require the use of a car, one equipped with tires that can handle the Northwest's extreme winter conditions.

There are a few main ways to increase your traction on icy roads, including types of tires and traction devices.

All-season radial tires can be used, but are limited in true winter driving. The advantages to using this type of tire are that they run quietly, generally get better gas mileage and are used year-round.

Siping an all-season radial tire, which involves slitting the treads, will increase traction on ice, but costs an additional $5 to $10 per tire.

According to a Les Schwab representative, "Siping will give you a little more traction, but not as much as studs."

A true winter tire is one that has a more aggressive tread pattern and one that will increase traction and control in snow. This type of tire is a seasonal tire, one that normally is removed at the end of winter.

"The main reason to use M & S (Mud and Snow) rated radial tires rather than all-season radial tires in the winter is for traction enhancement," said Rob Osmun, manager of Bru-nel Tire and Auto Service Center.

The greatest traction is gained through the use of studded snow tires, and are recommended for use in the most inclement winter conditions and for long-distance driving when conditions are unpredictable. Studs are carbide-tipped pins that are permanently inserted into the tread of the tire. This type of tire must be removed at the end of the season in order to prevent excessive damage to roadways.

If studded tires are used on a front-wheel drive car, it is recommended all four tires be studded. If only the front tires are studded spin-outs can result under braking, as the rear wheels may lock.

Most service centers provide winter tire checks free of charge.

On a rear-wheel drive car, only the rear tires need to be studded, but braking traction will be increased if all four tires are studded.

The ultimate traction for snow is attained through the use of tire chains or cables. For smaller cars with radial tires, cables are a more efficient alternative because they run quieter, faster, and safer. For larger cars and trucks, only a true tire chain is strong enough.

Wayne Krauss, manager of Martin Auto Service, said an individual needs to find out what his or her driving requirements are, including driving conditions and distances, before making a decision concerning tires. He also advised having tire pressure and wear checked before the winter season, a service most service centers in town provide free of charge.

Drivers: Be aware of pedestrians

By DOUG BAUER
 Commentary

People in this great nation have many problems when driving, and most of them occur when the winter road conditions are cold and icy. The most unfortunate thing is that pedestrians, among other people, do nothing to help drivers out.

It is a true fact that most pedestrians think that they own the road. Most of these people have the problem of believing that they can run across the road before a car can reach them.

Yeah, and I can dodge a speeding bullet.

That's pretty much what most of these "road crossers" are attempting to do. People have simply got to remember that there are icy conditions on all roads at this time of the year and that cars cannot stop when there is a person running 15 feet in front of them.

Drivers have got to be aware that these people are stuck in the "summer year-round" mode, which means that they think the roads are in dry, tip-top shape no matter what the season is. They believe that no matter what the conditions are, the driver is looking out for them and is constantly aware of their presence in the middle of the road.

I myself have seen these same people tease me as I am driving along, by doing a dance in the middle of the road, seemingly daring me to score a few pedestrian points.

The sad thing is that these same people that are crossing the roads are the people that are reading about fellow idiots in the paper getting hit, and blaming it on the poor driving techniques of the general American population.

Drivers are likely to always be in the wrong when the law is concerned. After all, isn't it the police's job to try to decrease the number of drivers on the road by revoking their licenses?

I think that someone should enforce a pedestrian's license.

That would be great. Every pedestrian would have to go to their walkers education class and learn to use an age-old technique called crosswalks.

I think that these people really need to be educated before they take their life in their own hands and cross the road.

What do we need to do? Hire crossing guards to make sure that these people don't jump out in front of cars, and when they do, slap them across the hand with a citation.

That reminds me, I thought jaywalking was illegal. I've seen plenty of Moscow's finest cruise on by a couple of idiots while they were sprinting for their life across main street.

I think that if people are going to pin the blame on drivers for all of the problems that occur where pedestrians are involved, then maybe they should have people try to become a professional hood ornament while they are behind the wheel.

'Boyz' not another minority exploitation film

Review by MEYLA BIANCO
Staff Writer

Boyz n the Hood is an excellent film. That's it. That's all. It is as straightforward as the first sentence of this paragraph, and that is what makes it so effective, so chilling, and so relevant.

This movie focuses on the life of one young black man, but seemed to speak for many in similar situations. The film explored contemporary black issues including teen pregnancy, AIDS, educational opportunities, and most notably, violence. Because reams and reams of text have been written on these subjects, and because many films share these thematic elements, you may think of Boyz n the Hood as a potential cliché. However, I thought the film brought these common issues to light in a highly original and innovative way.

The main value of this film to me is that the tale is told from a wholly black point of view, with a minimum of stereotypical sludge. This movie was produced by a young black man, a person presumably familiar with the situations in the film, which allows the movie to portray believable situations in a poignant way. It is evident that the film is in no way a studio fabrication, but an accurate recreation of a scenario; of the black scenario of Los Angeles, California.

I felt as if I was being educated as I watched this film. I became aware of the image that I had been exposed to in the media regarding black people, and I was disgusted. This story made me more critical of the television and movie image of blacks today.

In this story, the mother and father are not on welfare, they are not drug dealers, they are not homeless and they are not lazy. Instead, the parents in the film are people a person can respect, people who have worked for their positions and their possessions, and most importantly, are devoted to bringing up their son according to a strict code of quality.

I think that the message behind this film is the most important aspect of it. The plot is, to me, a universal example of a common theme, and the tragedy associated with similar occurrences. As one watches the film, it becomes clear that the problems prevalent in black neighborhoods will not disappear, and that something needs to be done to make things change.

The plot involves a neighborhood of young boys and their growth into manhood, culminating in the fatal shooting of Ricky, a man who is striving for a position in life that he feels is respectable—a career in college football. Ricky is a prime example of the futility of violence and the vicious circle that it creates. He is a man who has made it his goal to get ahead of the negative happenings in his neighborhood, and to move on. Ricky is the film's example of the useless loss of life that drive-by shootings and other violence result in.

One of the more eerie aspects of Ricky's death is the issue of his test scores. If he scores better than a 700 on his SATs, he gets a scholarship to college to play football. There is the typical long wait for the test scores to arrive, and the day they do, Ricky is shot by a group of men that had hassled him earlier for no reason. The results of the test are exceptionally haunting and ironic. Ricky receives a 710. Had he been alive, Ricky could have realized his dreams and become what he wanted to be: successful.

Boyz n' the Hood is an exceptional film which will be showing soon at The Micro. If you are in the mood for a double dose of relevant reality, see it. If you're not, see it anyway.

Zefirelli's 'Hamlet' gives Shakespeare a modern sheen

Review by HEIDI KENYON
Staff Writer

Shakespeare can be really scary.

To pick up a play that you are told is written in English, yet not be able to understand a word of it, that's scary. Shakespeare does that to people. His language is so flowery and weird-sounding to us than many people feel better just leaving him alone.

But there is greatness to be found underneath all that twisting, complex prose. And although some people feel that it takes a great scholar to plod through some of these plays, going to the movies is a much easier, and often more enjoyable, option.

Franco Zefirelli makes this possible with the latest film version of Shakespeare's Hamlet, which is playing at the Micro through Wednesday, November 6.

The movie stars Mel Gibson and Glenn Close, and is a fabulous rendition of this classic play.

The text is pure Shakespeare, but the screenwriter has moved many of the lines around, and wrote out a great deal of them entirely. Despite this cutting and pasting, the show retains its integrity, and the streamlining makes it more understandable and more interesting.

Hamlet is not a moldy old relic for English and Theatre majors to rack their brains over. It is a gripping drama about betrayal, incest, murder and madness. There is plenty of sex and swordplay, and quite a bit of humor.

While Hamlet is well worth reading for its own sake, the movie compliments the written text, yet is perfectly capable of standing on its own. Shakespeare is a part of our cultural history, and Zefirelli's film is a good way to learn something and enjoy yourself, as well.

If you can't afford the bucks

"Hamlet is not a moldy old relic ... It is a gripping drama about betrayal, incest, murder, and madness."

for the theatre, though, or you need to do an intensive study of the film and don't want to pay each time to see it on wide screen, fear not. Hamlet has been released on video, and is available at any video store on the Palouse.

For a further expansion into Shakespeare on film, try the Lawrence Olivier version of Hamlet; Zefirelli's other classics, Romeo and Juliet and Macbeth or Kenneth Branagh's Henry V.

New Richie Sambora album stinks of lost talent

Review by MEYLA BIANCO
Staff Writer

I won't admit to buying the CD I am about to review, nor will I mention the name of the person (let's just call him Trent) that I got it from, so as not to embarrass him by mentioning his name in the same article as Richie Sambora. In any case, I got a hold of the new Richie Sambora CD, I listened to it, and I got sick. Really, really sick. After that was over, I got depressed, and I mean sad. We are talking about my being hunched over my stereo, tearful and despondent, and humming Living on a Prayer. It was pitiful. I began scanning my mind for the place that I had left my Bon Jovi tee shirt last, (I hoped it was not the one I used to clean up the dog barf.) I was obviously latching on to anything remotely connected to the band, in a last gasp effort to preserve their legendary sound.

Where was the Jon Bon Jovisque sound I cherished? Where were the trashy lyrics and shallow ideas? Where was all that bare-shirted wailing that set my mind afire with memories of high school and guys wearing too much Brute, and girls in Chic jeans? Gone for good apparently.

This album was entirely full of long and loud squealing noises punctuated by jazzy drumming and that way, way overdubbed sound. I am now pretty sure the whining squealy sounds were guitars, but they could've been stuck pigs.

As I was listening, a queer sensation came over me. I began to feel as if I was trapped in the body of a bandannaed, eyelinered and spandex-clad fifteen year old. Then, and only then, did I get the strange floating sensation one experiences when enjoying music. However, it didn't last long. Soon I was back to feeling nauseated.

If you like Bon Jovi, I'm sorry. If you thought you would like Richie Sambora because you liked Bon Jovi, I'm really sorry. However, I bet the people who spent fifteen hard earned dollars on this CD are far, far sorer. Don't be one of them.

LIVING WITH MEN Part V: Bickering by Heidi Kenyon

The other night the boys and I were sitting around playing cards. Somebody was not being a very defensive player, and the following conversation took place between the two gentlemen, expletives deleted:

"Danny, you're such an idiot!"
 "I am not!"
 "You're so stupid!"
 "I am not!"
 "Idiot, idiot, idiot!"
 "I am not! Jake, you better watch out, or you're going to get it."

Unfortunately, I am not kidding, nor am I making this up. The saddest part is that they continued to bicker not only throughout the game, but for a good while afterward. Eventually, I nearly forgot what they were arguing about, because the subject of the derisive comments and comebacks had shifted from their respective levels of intelligence, to their sexual prowess, from the amount of muscle mass each possessed, to how much each knew about this or that make and model of car. I don't know why it mattered in the first place, as neither one of them won the card game.

Why is this back-and-forth bickering such an integral part of male interaction? They seem to actually like giving each other hell. One of Jake's favorite prods is women, because of Danny's single status. "Want me to invite someone to the party for you, Danny? I know you can't find anyone..." (Did I mention that the boys frequently come close to killing each other?)

They argue over the setting on the thermostat. They argue over what radio station to listen to.

They argue over how to do the dishes (I'm sure they'd rather argue than actually do them.) They argue over who gets to sit in the easy chair and how close or far from it the footstool can be moved.

This one-upmanship and derision extends even beyond argument, into the realm of practical jokes. It's a good thing they mostly just pick on each other. We would have serious household problems if they turned on the hot water while I was in the shower.

There have also been instances of people eating all the ice cream, then filling the carton with water, freezing it, and smoothing a layer of ice cream over the top. Empty beer bottles put back in the fridge, especially with stuff in them, are also not nice. They say that they're just acting like brothers, but sometimes I think they must mean Cain and Abel. Although I love the boys dearly, there are times when I just want to tell them to stuff it. Among these times are when they're arguing over whether to open or close the shades or which one of them can shirk the most homework and still get a good grade.

Why don't they argue about things like who gets to cook me breakfast in bed today, or who bought me the prettiest flowers, or even whose turn it is to feed me grapes? Oh, well...Men...

an equal level. "Lowering the net makes the women's game as good a product as the men's version," volleyball coach Tom Hilbert said. "Some people even like it better." This may be true, but the fact is that women athletes have gotten better. Women are basically new to the world of big-time college athletics. At UI, full scholarships weren't offered for women basketball players until the 1970s and women didn't become part of the NCAA until 1980. Through prope training women have also become bigger, stronger athletes, like their male counterparts.

Gone our the days when tiny women specialized at certain positions on the basketball and volleyball floors. Now six-foot athletes can be seen having an impact. "I remember the days when six footers on teams were rare," Hilbert said. "Now most teams have a bunch of them that can play a variety of positions."

The problem for the Vandals is getting these athletes to come to Moscow. In comparison with the rest of the country, the Northwest is a remote outpost. Idaho, Washington and Oregon don't have the population base that other regions of the country have. "We don't have the resources to recruit nationwide and besides, it would be a waste of our money," Hilbert said. "Most people around the country don't realize that Idaho has Division I volleyball program."

The same can be said for basketball. Not only does Turner not have the resources to recruit far, she doesn't have the junior college feeder that the Vandal men have. Over half the men's players are from jucos around the nation, which allows them to have racial diversity. The men have just three white players on the team, while the women have no blacks.

"We don't get any of the juco or prop. 48 kids like the men have," Turner said. "The junior college system isn't like what the men have, but I also see this changing."

$775,000. That is the amount of money that ticket revenues brought in for Vandal athletics last athletic season. Unfortunately for women, only $6,000 of that was brought in by their sports. This just reinforces a fact that's been known for years: Men's sports are what people watch and that brings in the money.

That is why the men have the larger recruiting budget. They are in a must-win-or-else situation and Turner admits that it's sometimes nice to not have the win-at-all-costs monkey on her back. "I like to win as much as the next person, but I keep things in perspective," Turner said. "In reality I don't have the daily stresses that the men have, but I add plenty of self-imposed pressure."

The philosophy of Athletic Director Gary Hunter is to keep the men's programs at a winning level and slowly bring up what he calls the Olympic sports. "I don't like to term the sports by genders," Hunter said. "We have sports like track, tennis and cross country where both men and women are in the same financial boat."

To keep the women's financial boat floating, the NCAA adopted Title IX, which makes sure that women's athletics are funded in accordance with men's. This doesn't mean that women are funded 50-50; they're not. It does mean that the government has mandated laws stating that women must have a chance. This in part will help the UI add women's golf next year.

UI doesn't have the funds which allow them to keep all of their sports at a full scholarship level for all members. Only men's and women's basketball, volleyball and football are fully funded sports at UI.

Despite this, both Turner and Hilbert have no regrets about not coaching at a powerhouse college. "When I was coaching at Oklahoma we had everything you could ask for and were ranked 12th in the nation," Hilbert said. "Unfortunately (Athletic Director) Donnie Duncan had no idea who I was. It's more like a family at Idaho."

"I'm not saying I wouldn't ever want to coach at a large school, but I'm very happy to be a coach at Idaho," Turner said.

The king, so to speak, sits rather comfortably behind his chair in the largest office at the athletic department. What would football coach John L. Smith, a man who is fully funded, have to worry about? How about his nine-year old daughter Kayse, and her wanting to play baseball? "She was the only girl on the team and she wanted to be with the boys," Smith said. "We supported her in that."

This says that the 1950s stereotype of women playing with Barbie Dolls and being "sugar and spice and everything nice" is finally disintegrating. Women can sweat and bleed and still be feminine, not some freak of nature. "I lift weights, run and sweat, but I don't live it every minute of the day," Moeller said.

"I'll be honest, I think a woman with an athletic body is a beautiful thing," Hilbert said. "It's not a macho thing to have an athletic body, it's something that is for everyone."

But what of the coaching profession? Plenty of men coach women, but the only woman coach for men in collegiate athletics is an assistant coach at Kentucky. Should women just be coaching other women? Does it undermine their chances for equal opportunity in coaching? "I just love to coach, whether it be men or women," Hilbert said. "I think that it's fine that women coach men. What you have to do is start when the men are young. It's hard to get a male athlete used to a woman when he's been coached by a man his whole life."

by closing their eyes to drinking in the dorms or greek houses doesn't address the problem. Some drivers will make the personal choice to get behind the wheel regardless of the legal age laws. If the age was 19, there would be 17 year olds who will want it lower, just as there will still be 19 year olds who will get behind the wheel after legally drinking. Lowering the drinking age or providing "safe" places for non-legal drinkers to drink isn't a permanent solution. Making our future leaders aware of their actions is. The problem here is the combination of drinking and driving. The choice for anyone to get into a motor vehicle after drinking is a personal one- not one made by the government to "please" anyone.

Laws are created to protect the people, and it is our individual choice to either follow these laws, or argue for change-not to get behind the wheel, drive irresponsibly, and then turn around and blame the government when we interpret the laws to be "unfair". If we choose to disobey the rules, then we have also chosen the consequences. The government is not to blame here, nor are they to blame for any such occurrence. The government doesn't hand keys to a driver who may have had "too much to drink" and the government doesn't have any control over our automobiles and how we choose to drive them. That, Mr. Editor is the point.

effective student-teacher relationship, it seems that it would be beneficial if the instructors get several evaluations, say one each month. That will allow them to see the class through the eyes of the students, and make the necessary adjustments, as the semester progresses.

During my college years, I only saw once that an instructor gave to students an evaluation form (on her initiative) during the ones who set up the timber sales, or decide how they are to be logged. This ecological civil war that you refer to is the most asinine thing I've ever heard of. Spiking trees and monkey-wrenching with logging equipment are, however, grounds for a confrontation. I invite you to visit a sawmill and ask what happens when a saw hits a spike. Better yet, why don't you ask somebody who has been injured by such an accident.

You and other misinformed people have this wild conception that a logger is some kind of "Nature Raper". I'll admit that clear cuts are salvage sales in which the timber has been killed by such things as forest fires or insects. Logging methods have improved to decrease damage to residual trees, increase tree utilization, as well as to reduce soil compaction.

If you want to help the situation, why don't you quit just writing about it, and do something to improve it. You could begin by obtaining some background on the situation before you go shooting your mouth off about it.
