Initiative means up to $10 million loss for UI

By BRANDY CORGATELLI
Staff Writer

Educators congregated at Moscow High School Thursday night to talk about how they could oppose the One Percent Tax Initiative.

The initiative is "the single most important issue facing the educational community and the state of Idaho this year," said Mike Friend, the executive director for the Idaho Association of School Administrators.

Representatives from the UI faculty council and the UI student senate attended the meeting, along with teachers and principals from elementary and high schools throughout the region.

The initiative on this year's ballot requires that the rate of taxes not exceed one percent of the market value of property (home and lot) after January 1, 1993, if the measure is approved. Latah County property taxes currently range between 1.4 percent and 2.7 percent, according to the county assessor's office.

Therefore, a $75,000 home in Moscow pays around $1,500 every year with an average two percent property tax. The homeowner would pay half of that amount—$750—if the initiative passes.

The idea of lower taxes is popular with voters, but school district budgets would suffer tremendously because schools raise much of their revenue from property taxes, according to Friend.

UI could lose $10.7 million from its budget, according to a statement released this summer by the university.

The UI statement describes five different steps the university might take if faced with an over $10 million revenue loss.

- They could eliminate $10.7 million worth of programs and services.

- They may reduce the student body by 2,900 students.

- They might raise each student's fees by $1,250 per year.

- They could eliminate 250 faculty and staff positions.

- They could decrease salaries for all employees by 24 percent.

Most recent polls show a margin of support for the initiative, with an even larger undecided population.

"They are going to make up their mind in the next 46 days," Friend said. "We have to inform them how it would affect their local school district and hope that this will elicit a negative vote."

Friend cited a recent Kootenai County poll as an example of the public's attitude. In that poll, 49 percent of the people said they would vote for the One Percent Initiative with 33 percent still undecided.

The number of groups, associations, and businesses opposed to the initiative is tremendous. "When I looked at the list (of those against the initiative), I thought, 'who is left in Idaho to be for this thing,'" said David Larocco, a former Minnesota resident who moved to Idaho three weeks ago to help in the Anti-One Percent movement.

Larocco suggested the support is coming from fed-up taxpayers. "We are dealing with an emotional issue," he said. "People don't like to be taxed."

Friend added, "When you get to the bottom of people's feelings, you find that what it is they are upset about is not property taxes by federal spending."

People feel federal spending and federal taxes are out of control but they feel helpless to stop this, according to Friend. Instead, they are attacking the one thing they can get at, which is property taxes, he said.

Stallings discusses Central America

By SAMANTHA GROOM
News Editor

U.S. Representative Richard Stallings spoke to the Coalition for Central America Sunday night at the Campus Christian Center.

Stallings was covering familiar territory in this campaign stop, as he is the former professor of Latin American Studies at Ricks College.

In his opening remarks to the group, he discussed why he opposed military aid to the Contras during the Reagan administration.

He also said he received more calls on the Contra issue than any other while he's been in the House. He received 2,700 calls, 1,800 in opposition of military aid.

He related one story about a call he received from a couple in California. They said they used to live in Idaho and they knew most people would be opposed to how he voted. What part of Idaho were they from? Des Moines.

He said that he sees many opportunities for helping people in Central America, but not through military aid. "I am an opponent of us (the U.S.) being an arms dealer of the world," he said. "Interest and enthusiasm drops when you try to help them (people) for peaceful purposes."

Members of the Coalition for Central American informed him of the problems they've seen firsthand on their visits to Central America. The topic then changed to the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA).

NAFTA, in essence, opens free trade between the U.S., Canada and Mexico.

Stallings is opposed to NAFTA, but thinks the basic concept of free trade is good. He said he thinks the administration has made significant sacrifices on several fronts.

Stallings says under NAFTA, things as basic as meat would be affected. Meat in the U.S. is strictly controlled through the U.S. Department of Agriculture, requiring inspections, and deciding what hormones can and cannot be used. Stallings claims meat imported from Mexico may not have passed the same inspections as meat from the U.S. He claims the U.S. would have to set up its own inspections, which would cost taxpayers.

Environmentally, he says the U.S. runs the risk of American factories going to Mexico where the environmental laws are less strict than the U.S.

He says organized labor is also against NAFTA because of the risk of U.S. companies running off to Mexico for cheaper labor.

The main advantage would be oil, piped in from Mexico's pipeline, according to Stallings.

"I think a majority of Americans have doubts about it (NAFTA)," said Stallings.

Stallings gives scholarship

UI student Monte Lyn Coburn is the latest beneficiary of Congressman Richard Stallings' pay raise. Stallings presented her with a full-tuition scholarship at the Letters & Science office Monday afternoon.

Stallings has been giving away his Congressional pay raise money for the last five years as scholarships to non-traditional students.

Dean of the College of Letters and Science, Dene Thomas, hosted the award presentation. She said "It is admirable that Stallings has begun awarding scholarships to promising and needing non-traditional students."

Stallings said he gives ten scholarships a year to students around the state. Stallings chose education to fund his pay raise on "because it is an investment. It gives them the skills to make it in the world."

Stallings said in his final remarks to Coburn, a Political Science and English major, that she had better write to him and keep him informed on how she is doing.

Runners go crazy for Moscow Mtn. Madness

CHRIS MILLER
Staff Writer

Moscow Mountain Madness returned in full stride, with 89 racers braving twisted ankles and head-over-handlebar wrecks, to compete across 12 miles of rugged terrain up the spine of Moscow Mountain Saturday morning.

The race began at the base of Moscow Mountain on Foothill Road and ended at the old Tamarack Ski Lodge near Troy. Competitors could race on foot or on mountain bikes.

"Basically the course is 10 miles up and two miles down," said race coordinator Jean Grammer. "There's some flat stretches, but not many."

"Running up Moscow Mountain is pretty tough," said Paul Johnson, a Pullman runner who won the men's overall foot race in 1:17'43", "There's a lot of elevation changes."

Melissa Madsen, a Moscow runner, won the women's overall footrace in 1:39'03".

John Kiess, a Pullman mountain biker, won the men's overall bike race in 55'35", and one way to gauge just how difficult the course is, is to compare the footrace and mountain bike win times—a difference of just 22 minutes. And in fact, Johnson passed twelve bikers, despite a twelve minute headstart for the bikers.

"We got a lot more mountain bikers (65) than we anticipated," said Grammer. "The most frequent comment heard from the bikers was 'Awesome!' The course was really rutted and tough and they liked that."

Kim Titus, a University of Idaho chemist who won the women's overall bike race in 1:09'57", thought the course was fun but tough, and biked the most of the course the day before the race. "We scouted to avoid too much trouble," she said.

Moscow Mountain Madness first ran annually in 1978 and lasted until 1988 when the previous race sponsors, the Moscow Roadrunners, disbanded. The Palouse Roadrunners, a non-profit running club covering Latah and Whitman counties, revived the race and hope to keep the tradition alive.

Boise's Race to Robie Creek (13 miles) is hyped to be "the toughest race in the Northwest," but those who have raced both, claim that Moscow Mountain Madness is the hardest. Gary Bryan, race coordinator who has run both races said, "There's aspects of this race (Moscow's) that make it more difficult... it's on an old logging road and is so uneven." Even though it is one mile shorter, it's still tougher. The racers must climb over 2000 feet before they finish.

Late summer weather can also play havoc with the race. In 1988, racers began in sunshine and ran through rain, then hail, and finally snow before they reached the finish line, which might have had something to do with the temporary hiatus.

UI professor and ASUI senator predict who will win the big race

Compiled by JEFF KAPOSTASY
Contributing Writer

Bush or Clinton in November? As part of the Argonaut election coverage, two local political experts were asked to respond to that big question.

First to respond is Dr. William Lund. Dr. Lund is a professor of political science at UI, and teaches a class on American political parties and elections.

Second is Richard Rock. Rock is a veteran ASUI senator and president of the UI Young Republicans. Both of the responses are uncut and in their entirety.

Dr. William Lund:
"If the presidential election were held tomorrow, Clinton would win by a narrow margin.

That prediction assumes that a presidential election is really 51 separate contests for votes in the electoral college. If Clinton holds that the 11 states Dukakis carried in 1988, he starts with 111 electoral votes. Recent polls in certain key states and among key groups of voters (former Perot supporters, "Reagan Democrats", etc.) indicate that he should be able to pick off four to five Southern states for another 50 electoral votes. He seems comfortably ahead in California (54 electoral votes), and in a couple of battleground "rust belt" states like Illinois (another 40 or so electoral votes). Throw in Maryland and New Jersey (25 Votes), and you have about 280 electoral votes, or 10 more than you need to win.

Those poll results probably reflect declines in personal income, negative perceptions of the overall state of the economy, and other measures which seem to pushing some recent Reagan-Bush supporters in the Democratic direction. In simple terms, doubt about the economy would, at the moment, overwhelm concerns about crime, trial lawyers, Hollywood decadence, and the Republican version of "family values."

Richard Rock:
"Speculating on this year's Presidential race isn't easy, especially with independent non-candidate Ross Perot on so many ballots, but I will have to agree with NBC anchor Tom Brokaw and say that this election is still President Bush's to lose.

The polls put Clinton ahead right now, but let's remember two things about polls. First, polls mean nothing this early in the campaign, and second, when they mean something, they are usually wrong. (Remember they predicted both Mondale and Dukakis would win.)

George Bush will win in November for three reasons:

1.) Bill Clinton's support is "soft". That is, many people are voting for Clinton because they are mad at Bush, not because they like Clinton. These votes will be difficult for Clinton to hold on to, especially as Bush begins to campaign.

2.) Bush has only just begun campaigning. Unlike his opponent, who has been campaigning full-time for the last nine months, Bush has only been in the ring since the end of the Republican convention.

3.) George Bush's domestic policies to create jobs, reform education, and overhaul our nation's health care system will work and represent what a majority of American want. And representing what the majority wants is the key to any successful campaign.

Judge encroached on justice with decision for athlete

There are two systems of justice in the state of Idaho now, one for athletes and one for the rest of society.

University of Idaho reserve offensive lineman Christopher Moore pleaded guilty to stealing about 20 compact discs last spring from a fraternity on campus.

Last week, Second District Court Judge John Bengston sentenced Moore to two years probation and 30 days in jail for grand theft.

However, Bengston then extended a courtesy to Moore that other convicted criminals haven't received. Bengston told Moore that he would not have to serve his jail time until after the football season.

Bengston probably would not let an Argonaut reporter delay serving a sentence until the end of the semester. It is doubtful whether a theatre major would be able to postpone incarceration because he or she was starring in a play.

But Bengston sent a message to Moore and other athletes that they are special. Athletes don't have to abide by the same laws as the rest of society. Because they can run, catch, block or pass, athletes are free to run amok and can delay paying the consequences.

Of course, Bengston's decision was not the first time that an athlete has received preferential treatment in court or anywhere else. However, a history of wrongdoing does not negate or legitimize the wrong.

If Bengston had forced Moore to serve his sentence, Moore would be back on the gridiron in time for the Oct. 24 face-off against Northern Iowa. While the team would have missed him, it is doubtful that he is irreplaceable. Moore would have learned that when he commits the crime, he does the time. Other athletes would have also have gotten the message. Instead Moore learned that because he wears an Idaho jersey, he can serve his time when it is convenient.

Bengston's ruling taught Moore that he is an athlete first and a citizen of Idaho second. That simply isn't the case. Moore is a citizen first and an athlete second. He knew that stealing from other citizens was wrong. He took the risk. He got caught.

And now he owes a debt to society — not a feeble IOU and a "I'll catch you at the end of the semester."

Sadly Bengston's ruling perpetuated the double standard that allows some athletes to get away with most crimes short of murder. The tragedy is that one day, society won't look at Christopher Moore as an athlete to be treated with kid gloves. One day society will just look at him as a student with a record. How fast he can run or his blocking abilities won't help him if he has another run-in with the law.

Athletes can't and shouldn't be sheltered from justice. Just because they are quick and graceful does not mean they should be allowed to outrun the long arm of the law.

The scales of justice tipped the wrong way in this case. Hopefully next time justice will be blind to whether a student is an athlete, a bookworm or a coach potato.

Hopefully next time, there will be justice, period.

In praise of the political science department

COMMENTARY
BY
JEFF KAPOSTASY

Nestled next to the creaky boards on the second floor of the Administration Building sits, in my opinion, perhaps the finest department here in Zinserland, USA.

It is not as well known as the engineering department or the brains of the forestry program, but I am completely in awe at the amount of knowledge here.

The department of which I write is political science. Now I realize that to most people, questions about electoral votes and the future of the Middle East concern students a lot less than if there will be a keg party this weekend. But I, for one, find it hard to believe that such intelligent people exist. People who actually learn as a hobby, not because they have a test coming up. People who really care about the future of the world.

Being a political science minor, I have taken classes from three members of the department and have little bad to say about any of them. My first encounter with political science was so interesting, I changed my original minor from sociology to polisci.

I first set foot in Dr. Alwyn

It's time to choose owls over jobs

"The balance has been lost," George Bush said recently, referring to the current debate over the Endangered Species Act.

Like hell, I say.

The ESA is being misused by "people with extreme views" to lock up the Northwest's forests, Bush said.

Like hell, I say.

"The law is broken, and it must be fixed," he said. "It is time to make people more important than owls."

Like hell, I say.

Dressed in casual attire, Bush addressed a crowd of millworkers and loggers at a lumber company in northeastern Washington last week. Behind the president were stacks of lumber and thickly-forested mountains.

The president's visit was a slickly contrived political stunt. He was not only playing to the prejudices of the local timber-dependent community when he assailed the Endangered Species Act, but to the nation as a whole.

Bush knew that when film of his visit was shown on the evening news, people in Cleveland and Des Moines would see these immense stacks of lumber and the forest in the background. He is hoping that the average easterner will start to wonder if all the concern about the fate of America's forests and endangered species isn't just the overblown hype of a cabal of radical preservationists.

COMMENTARY

In an attempt to garner the mantle of the "environmental candidate," Bill Clinton has called for a biological and economic summit to examine Northwest timber problems. The president didn't think that was such a good idea.

"We don't need any more studies of this problem," he said, correctly.

"Let's change the law," he continued, incorrectly.

He even went so far as to say that he would not sign reauthorization of the Act unless it is rewritten to take jobs into greater consideration. His lips may be moving, but fewer and fewer people are reading what they say.

Congress has postponed voting on the issue until after the November election. If Bush is still in the Oval Office when the reauthorization makes it to the president's desk, perhaps he should look at the results of the most recent public opinion survey concerning the ESA. According to the poll, 66 percent of Americans support the Act, while 11 percent are opposed.

In cases where a local industry is hurt by laws protecting wildlife, 48 percent of the respondents said their sympathies lie with the

Republicans have best proposal for family leave

GUEST COMMENTARY
BY NORMAN SEMANKO

Last week the United States Congress had a clear choice between using a carrot or a stick. They chose the stick, and will continue to beat American businesses and families over the head with it day after day.

The subject is the latest installment in the national Democratic party's ongoing attempt to fool the American people into thinking that it actually represents the mainstream of American public opinion. That is, of course, the Family and Medical Leave Act.

Heidi Kenyon's commentary in the Argonaut last week, lambasting George Bush for opposing the Democrats' legislation, was an artful display of rhetoric and emotion. But how about a few facts?

Fact #1: Family and medical leave is the "most important benefit" to exactly one percent of the American work force.

Fact #2: By an 89 percent to 6 percent margin, Americans prefer to have benefits set by employer-employee negotiations, not federal mandate.

Fact #3: Recent surveys show that 97 percent to 99 percent of American businesses provide some form of paid benefits, whether hospital coverage, profit-sharing, dental plans, defined contribution and/or family-related leave.

Fact #4: According to the Small Business Administration, depending on firm size, from 74 percent to 90 percent of employers already provide some type of leave to meet parental, family and medical needs.

Not quite the disaster that the three ring circus in Washington and its liberal cronies in the media would lead you to believe it is. If it were, why would Congress wait the better part of a year to put the final touches on legislation that was passed last fall? Other legislation has been passed and sent to the president in a matter of hours.

Clearly the Family and Medical Leave Act is a mandate without a cause. However, it has made for some spirited debate and provided a clear dividing line between Republicans and Democrats this November.

On one side of the line are Democrats, always recognizing problems developed via isolated horror stories and worst case scenarios. And there they stand, ready to bring the government in to solve these "problems." They don't trust businesses and employees to work things out themselves over the bargaining table. Remember this is the malaise party of gloom and doom.

On the other side of the line are Republicans. They want American workers to be provided with leave benefits, too. Only they want to see it done through incentives (the carrot), not a federal mandate (the stick).

They also want to make sure any government action targets the truly needy. Republicans, unlike Democrats, believe in the spirit of American business and free enterprise and know that employers and employees, in most cases, can work things out. Let's just give them a chance, instead of drawing lines in the sand.

And so, what is the Republican proposal for family and medical leave? It is a forward-looking proposal to provide tax incentives for employers to provide leave during times of critical family responsibility. Most importantly, it is focused on small and medium businesses — those that currently have the hardest time providing leave for their employees.

The Democrats' bill, by the way, doesn't even apply to businesses with less than 50 employees. That leaves a lot of folks out in the cold.

The Republican measure would help provide these benefits to employees in businesses with less than 500 employees. Yet it would leave intact the current flexibility that allows employers and employees to negotiate exactly what other benefits should be provided.

Unfortunately, this well-meaning and yes, very "prudent," approach is all but certain to be sacrificed on the Democrats' altar of desperation for the White House. Truth and reason have very little to do with the current state of affairs in electoral politics.

Let's not be fooled. We need to recognize the real problem. American voters should stand up this fall and rid this nation of the albatross that has hung around its neck for nearly a half-century — the Democrat-controlled Congress.

Let's throw those bums in Congress out. Until we do, we will just have more of the same.

wildlife and 29 percent said they felt sorry for the businesses. Fourteen percent said they split their sympathy between the two.

Revising the ESA to consider economic impacts would run counter to the intentions of the Act. Many of the species in trouble have become threatened or endangered because their habitat has been reduced as a direct result of human economic development. Taking economics into account may not only wipe out the spotted owl, it may also preclude any attempt to save viable populations of grizzly bears, salmon and wolves.

If the economic impacts of saving a species are paramount to all other criteria, there will be damn few critters left which don't have some direct monetary benefit to humans. If an animal can't be eaten, or if a person can't buy a license to shoot it, it won't be around. Animals that have purely aesthetic value will be gone forever.

Endangered species in general, and spotted owls in specific, provide the timber industry with a few more scapegoats to blame for its troubles. Over the past few years, the industry has found fault with the government, environmentalists and the media, but the industry itself can do no wrong.

In fact, the chairman of the Oregon Lands Coalition, which represents timber families, recently said: "Preservationists are a multimillion dollar industry, and they are using the liberal media to tell slanted stories and fill their coffers."

As if representatives from the timber industry had never lobbied Congress and lined their own pockets at the expense of taxpayers. As if, until recently, Democratic and Republican politicians with big timber interests didn't have a headlock on policymaking.

And as if the average environmentalist was raking in a six-figure salary by attempting to preserve public lands from development and endangered species from extinction.

"We're fighting for our lives," said a supporter of the timber industry. "We want America to know that because of the preservation movement, we are losing our jobs and our homes and our children's future, and the truth is not being told."

Well, timber interests are damn lucky that the truth is not being told, otherwise they would have less support than they do now. If the organizers of Bush's visit last week were concerned about the truth, his speech would have taken place in a clearcut.

While the government did promote what many people feel was an unwise and unsustainable rate of harvest on national forests, the timber industry went along blindly with the assault, casting caution aside.

Now the industry is trying to make us believe that the spotted owl is a relatively recent problem, dropped in its lap by radical preservationists who are out to ruin the future of every logger.

Unfortunately for the industry, the fact that spotted owls may be threatened and in need of protection is not a newfangled scheme created by a bored group of environmentalists at a granola party. Many natural resource specialists knew 10 years ago that the species was in danger. Back then, or even in the intervening years, the federal government and the timber barons could have addressed the problem before it reached critical mass.

Instead of aiding a smooth transition from the timber harvesting policies of the past to something a bit more sustainable, they sat on their hands and let the cutting continue. Now we have a crisis.

Supporters of the timber industry always get their feathers ruffled when someone suggests that present logging practices are not at sustainable levels.

"Trees are a renewable resource," they are fond of chortling, when in fact they should be saying "trees can be a renewable resource, if the forests are managed properly." There is a great difference between what is possible and what simply is.

Timber jobs will eventually disappear. Personnel reductions are nothing new or unique to the timber industry. Past reductions have been made due to the updating and mechanizing of lumbermills, and federal law currently allows the State of Washington to export a quarter of its logs without being milled. Layoffs happen all the time in the automotive and steel industries. That's just the way it goes in the U.S. economy.

Putting jobs before owls would be only a stopgap solution. If the remaining stands of old growth timber are cut, the owls will disappear, but so will the portion of the timber industry that is geared toward cutting the big trees. Then who will the industry blame?

People who lose their jobs because of harvest restrictions enacted to save the spotted owl, or any other species, should suck up their guts, move their families and stop trying to sound like martyrs.

Being out of work is a tough thing to accept, especially when families are involved. However, supporters of the timber industry should remember that the forest also belongs to people who like watching owls and hiking through old growth, even if you can't turn a quick buck off the deal.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Zinser leads march toward academic disintegration

Editor:

Did anyone notice the article in the Tuesday, Sept. 15 edition of the Spokesman-Review with the headline "Panel says college students paying more, getting less"? The investigation, performed by the House Select Committee on Children, Youth and Families, told an interesting story. "Tuition and fees rose by 141 percent at public four-year colleges and universities from 1980 to 1990, and by 12 percent for the 1991-92 school year."

A little further on it read: "The teaching load of professors has dropped from the traditional 15 hours a semester to as low as 6 hours to allow more time for research." The slack is being taken up by teaching assistants. The study also found that counselors, coaches and other academic support professionals have grown by approximately 10 times the rate of full time faculty.

Is our new president Elisabeth Zinser bucking this trend? Well, she has consistently argued that the UI must increase fees to stay competitive with other institutions. She has stressed research to help Idaho's small communities (huh?) and the state in general achieve a better standard of living. I guess college graduates with a quality education do not benefit society.

And finally, I just heard on the radio yesterday that Idaho has hired a new athletic director from the University of Washington. I don't wish to belittle the athletic program but from the statistics in this article it is apparent that the university's priorities are distorted.

As a student I find it comforting to know that our president is not only following other universities in their march towards the disintegration of higher education in America, but is racing headlong to catch up with them.

Rouyer's intro-level class as a sophomore, interested in learning about stuff I am supposed to be interested in. I was immediately impressed at the way he was concerned about what the class thought about his lectures. He even asked students how they thought he should teach. This was quite a shock to me. The lectures, though they didn't involve "Dead Poet Society" methods, were straightforward and not at all confusing.

But even after class, Rouyer remembers his students. He'd always say "Hi" to me and treat me like a real person. Some professors have this really macho "ME PROF, YOU STUDENT" attitude that turns my stomach. I currently have Rouyer for Middle Eastern Politics, a class in which I learned more in my first week than in both my economics classes combined.

When he lectures, it's like all this knowledge in his head will explode if he doesn't get it across to students. (No, I'm not just saying this because we have a quiz tomorrow.)

For sheer lecture entertainment, the medal goes to Dr. William Lund. Lund has this dry, droll sense of humor that really shines through in lectures. The funny thing is I don't really think he means to be funny. It just kind of happens. Listening to Lund, I find it hard to fathom that some people are actually that intelligent. He once said that reading Hobbes' view of the State was like poetry. Why couldn't it seem that way to me?

Lund's lectures are, at least to me, interesting. He manages to take rocket science and turn it into a simple, understandable equation.

But Lund is one serious guy. Once, before the last lecture before spring break, someone in the class told Lund to let us go, since "spring break was here!" Lund's response was something like: "That is the attitude that is driving our country to the ground." He is probably right.

Then there is Dr. Don Crowley. Editor extraordinaire Pete Gomben and I took his environmental politics class, and we both agreed it was one of the best classes we had ever taken. I had heard he was a left-wing extremist, but other than saying he sided with the Endangered Species Act and against the timber industry, he was very fair.

In fact, all three of the profs have a reputation for being sort of lefty. But it was never unfair or never turned into a Reagan slugfest. In fact, one of my economics professors, obviously in bed with the conservative ideologies, was always filling our heads with the illusion that national health care was a sin and making us sit through these incredibly biased Milton Friedman films.

Hey Zinser. Give these guys a raise.

May makes 'Cats look like kittens

By LOREN ROBERTS
Sports Editor

What many coaches, fans, and media felt would be competitively the showdown of the year turned out to be the letdown of the year as Idaho demolished Weber State, 52-24, Saturday afternoon.

Idaho sophomore running back Sherriden May rushed for 202 yards on 31 carries which included three touchdowns in leading the Vandals (3-0, 1-0) to their first 200-plus yard performance by a single player since Devon Pearce did it against Boise State in 1990.

"Weber did a lot of stunts on the front line," May said. "But our offensive line did a great job, and there were a lot of holes that were real big."

Big is what Idaho made the gap between them, and the Wildcats (1-2, 0-1) in a hurry. Idaho took just 5:03 on their opening drive to take the ball 69 yards on 10 plays to set up May's first score. May plunged in from one-yard out to begin a 42-point scoring barrage by Idaho.

On the ensuing kick-off WSU put together an impressive drive, but couldn't capitalize as Patrik Schmidle missed a field goal attempt from 41-yards out. After Idaho took over on downs, Quarterback Doug Nussmeier took a draw play on third-and-nine for 54-yards down to the WSU 21. When asked at the press conference why he didn't go all the way, Nussmeier laughed about it.

"Man, I started going fine, but then my legs just started shaking, and they (WSU defenders) caught me from behind."

Five plays later, though, Nussmeier hit receiver Walter Saunders for a 10-yard strike to put the Vandals up 14-0 with 3:30 left in the first quarter. Even though they scored, Idaho Head Coach John L. Smith commented on Nussmeier not making it into the endzone.

"I think the quarterbacks are going to do a little extra running this week," Smith said with a smile. "I think they need it."

On WSU's next possession they appeared to be getting back into the game as they moved the ball 70 yards in five plays to the Idaho 10. But on first-and-10 WSU quarterback Jamie Martin fumbled on the one yard line on a scramble, and the ball went through the endzone. Due to a new rule in the NCAA, it was Idaho's possession at the point of the fumble. WSU Head Coach Dave Arslanian was enraged at the call, and penalized 15 yards for walking onto the field, and gave Idaho some breathing room. Arslanian felt that was the turning point in Idaho's favor.

"Idaho took hold right at the beginning, and never let it up."

Idaho had to punt the ball away, however, and WSU had good field possession on their own 48-yard line to begin the second quarter. But Idaho's defense, which along with the offensive line was credited for the win, stopped the 'Cats, and forced them to punt. Three plays later May bolted up the middle for his second touchdown, a 66-yarder to put Idaho up 21-0.

"We had great execution in the first-half," Smith said. "We got a break or two, but our kids played their tails off. They played like Vandals."

With last season's 45-17 loss to WSU in Ogden on their minds, Idaho moved the ball up and down the field with a revenge factor in mind. They scored two more times in the half to go up 35-0. The first was a Nussmeier to Yo Murphy 29-yard bullet, and the second was a seven yard toss to Saunders with 4:29 left in the first half. Nussmeier finished the game 13-for-19, for 188 yards, and four TD's.

"Last year we got our tails kicked, and it was embarrassing to be on the field, and embarrassing to be in the locker room," defensive end John Sirmon said. "The walls down there were paper thin, so we could hear them whooping it up."

As the second half began it looked like much more of the same for WSU. Idaho kicked-off, and on two consecutive plays Martin was introduced to Idaho defensive end Ahmani Johnson, who sacked Martin both times. On the second hit, Johnson forced Martin to cough the ball up, and the other end, Mr. (Jeff) Robinson pounced on it, giving Idaho possession on WSU's 19-yard line. In came May (be) Idaho's most impressive, young back since Pearce, who carried the ball for three yards, then six, six again, and then his third TD, a four-yard plunge to put the game out of reach, 42-0. Arslanian voiced how potent he felt the Vandal attack was on his team.

"I hope like heck Idaho is No. 1 in the conference because I'd hate to think we're playing somebody better later in the year," Arslanian said. "Idaho is definitely a top-10 team (in I-AA), and I'm going to vote them higher than that."

Weber finally got on the board with 9:57 left in the third quarter on a one-yard run by Von Robinson. WSU's scoring drive was successful due to their offense going to a no-huddle attack, which slowed down an Idaho defense that had been pressuring Martin all day.

"I thought we (the defense) played really well, but their draw hurt us," Sirmon said. "Overall I think we played pretty well, but our goal this season is to take it one game at a time."

Sirmon was recalling what happened to the Vandals last year when Idaho jumped out to a 3-0 record as well. After defeating Sonoma State, Southwest Texas State, and Montana State those 3-0 Vandals went 0-3 the next three weeks. Sirmon commented after the game what he

Saturday's laughter decided by running game

By DOUG TAYLOR
Staff Writer

The Weber State Wildcats literally had footprints on their backs after Saturday's 52-24 loss to the University of Idaho.

Yes, it was the return of smash-mouth football to the Kibbie Dome and the Vandals, led by sophomore running back Sherriden May, proved that it can be a powerful weapon in the team's offensive arsenal.

Given the chance to carry the ball 31 times, May had an afternoon which would have humbled Walter Payton as he rushed for 202 yards and three touchdowns. It was the highest rushing total by a Vandal since Devon Pierce ran for 226 yards against Boise St. in 1990.

As his rushing totals accumulated during the game, there were several aspects of May's running that football purists could enjoy.

On several carries, May appeared to be tackled by a Wildcat defender, but he would keep his feet moving in order to maintain balance. The result of this was that May would often be

On other carries, he would change direction so that he could rip off extra chunks of yardage.

One play, however, could be enjoyed by anyone watching the game.

Faced with a first-and-10 on its own 34, Vandal quarterback Doug Nussmeier handed the ball off to May as part of a called draw play. May received a good block from the left side of the line, accelerated quickly into the hole and then simply outran the Wildcat secondary to the end zone with 12:08 left in the second quarter. This spectacular touchdown was in addition to his scoring on plunges of one and four yards.

May wasn't the only one who enjoyed a good game on the ground as Nussmeier and running back Wind Henderson combined for 72 yards on 16 carries. Nussmeier had a run nearly as long as May when he rumbled down the field for a 54-yard gain in the first quarter, but unlike May, he didn't have enough gas left to finish.

"It was like you got out the stick and whip the horse," said Nussmeier to a middle linebacker in the endzone.

ished, the Vandals had piled up 304 rushing yards, and even defensive tackle John Sirmon got into the act by intercepting a Jamie Martin and lumbering for a nine-yard return.

"I was showing off my old full-back skills from high school," said Sirmon.

Coach John L. Smith gave Sirmon a curious look as an indicator that Vandal running backs didn't have to worry about their jobs being lost.

Sirmon's heroics aside, the biggest positive to come from the running game was that Wildcat standout quarterback Jamie Martin was largely denied the ball.

In the week leading up to the game, Smith had said it was critical that his team be able to establish a ground game. The primary reason for this was that Martin possessed the skills to turn the game into a high-scoring air show.

As a result, the Vandals wanted to control the clock with their offense, so that their defense would be fresh when facing Martin.

Weber did their controlling thing and kept it out of the hands of the running backs.

running back Lavoni Kidd after the game. "It obviously turned out to be a good strategy."

Kidd and the other running backs helped the Vandals use up 35:22 of the clock compared to Weber's 24:38. Although, Martin still ended up with 320 passing yards, a full 1/3 of these yards came in the fourth quarter when Vandal defensive reserves were in the game, and the game was far out of reach for the Wildcats.

Wind Henderson said the running game was crucial in the win, but he also praised the work of the defense.

"I couldn't believe how well our defense played," said Henderson. "They had a hand in Martin's face all day, and he just couldn't get anything done."

Coach Smith agreed. "We told them (the defense) we had to give pressure and get in Jamie's face, and they did," said Smith. "Martin just isn't the same kind of quarterback when he has pressure."

It was this total team effort that excited both the coaches and the team. Senior receiver Yo Murphy wanted to personally thank the running backs for their role in the victory.

"I hope Sherriden and the others can have more games like this," said Murphy. "If our running game is there, we will be unstoppable."

According to Murphy, a good running game would make the Vandals' air attack even stronger.

"Receivers won't starve for catches when the running game clicks because the defense will stop keying on our wideouts," said Murphy. "This will give Nuss more opportunities to create a big play through the air."

Murphy and the other Vandals made constant references to May, and after Saturday's game, the attention was certainly justified. However, May may find the going a bit tougher against Northern Iowa and Boise St., and certainly, opponents will key on him a bit more after this game.

This didn't seem to bother May, though, when asked about the rest of the season.

"There were some big holes out there that I might not see away, but I think I can help contribute to this offense," said May.

With this offensive line, we might have more running backs like Sherriden May. Jeff Curtis felt about being on one of the best teams in I-AA.

"Hey, if you (the media) think we're No. 1 then put us there. If you feel we're last then that's fine, too. We don't care."

After Idaho and WSU exchanged scores to make it 52-16, Sirmon showed his ability to use his mits when he got his first career interception. Martin passed to a receiver, but the ball bounced off his chest in the endzone, and landed in Sirmon's hands on the five. Sirmon then showed May a thing or two by taking the ball nine yards out to the 14.

"It was a pretty weird feeling to be tackled because I haven't been since I was in high school," Sirmon said. "I was rumblin', bumblin', and stumblin' up the field."

Idaho will tackle a bye this weekend which Coach Smith said is much needed. After two straight big wins, Idaho will be looking to heal-up before their Oct. 3 home match-up with Division II Cal-State Northridge.

"It's a big win, it's a real big win," Smith said. "We had to come out, and establish ourselves. Now we're going to take this next week, and polish up. We need this week off so we can get a couple of guys healthy."

Netters claim second-place trophy

By DOUG TAYLOR

The University of Idaho volleyball team is quietly making the point that Big Sky coaches can be wrong.

Picked by many coaches to finish near the middle of the Big Sky Conference, the Vandals have bolted out of the gates with an 8-2 record after last weekend's Sooner Invitational.

The Vandals opened the tournament with a 15-3, 15-12, 10-15, 15-10 win over the University of Oklahoma.

Led by Amie Hanks' 42 assists, the Vandals had an attack which produced 60 kills. Outside hitter Heather McEwen, Jessica Puckett and Dee Porter combined for 44 of these kills. Brittany Van Haverbeke also enjoyed a solid match with six kills, eight digs and six blocks.

Next up were the Illinois State Redbirds, and although it defeated the Vandals, 15-13, 15-7, 10-15, 15-9, Hanks and McEwen again made big contributions. Hanks came through with 51 assists for the match, and McEwen pounded 15 kills. McEwen's kills along with 16 from Nancy Wicks were a main reason why Idaho finished with an incredible 62 kills against the Redbirds.

Coming into Saturday's finale against Tulsa, the Vandals wanted to finish with a win that would give them momentum heading into this weekend's Big Sky opener against Montana and Montana St. They didn't come away disappointed as they finished Tulsa off in three games with a 15-8, 15-3, 15-6 win.

Porter led the Vandal attack with eight kills and three service aces while Hanks recorded 29 assists.

The Vandals' second-place finish was enough to land both McEwen and Hanks on the Sooner Invitational all-tournament team. In addition, McEwen was named the Big Sky Conference's athlete of the week.

With 122 assists over the weekend, Hanks now has 290 assists for an average of 9.1 assists per game. McEwen has benefitted the most from Hanks' passing as she now has 80 kills on the young season. Porter's three service aces in the Tulsa match gives her a team-leading 22 aces.

As a team, the Vandals' hitting percentage after 10 matches is a lofty .304, and defensively, the Vandals have limited opponents to a .115 hitting percentage. Van Haverbeke is proving to be a big contributor to the Vandals' defensive fortunes because of her team-high 42 blocks.

The Vandals can now look forward to a week of practice as it opens Big Sky Conference play on Friday, Sept. 25 against the Montana Grizzlies and the Montana State Bobcats on Sept. 26. Both games are in Memorial Gym and begin at 7:30 p.m.

FALL FASHION IN '92'

Fashion information from UI prof and student

By PATTI CROW
Contributing Writer

There is much more to fashion than the runway scenes in New York, Paris or Milan.

Students and teachers involved with the Clothing Construction, Textiles and Design department of the Home Economics School study many aspects of the clothing industry through classes in art, design, sewing, business, and history.

Along with classes, students also get "hands on" experience through field trips, projects and internships.

Fashion Design student Christy Lambert said that her art and tailoring classes have been especially helpful.

She added that she is interested in the history and restoration of clothes, and she had a chance to explore this field in depth when she interned at the McConnell Mansion.

Lambert has taken a class from Carol Rutberg, a graduate student who teaches Introduction to the Fashion Industry.

Rutberg, who is now studying childhood development, said that because of the unsettled economic condition the United States is in, people will be wearing many different things this fall.

"Anything goes," are the buzzwords for the coming year, Rutberg said, adding that a lot of middle-class women are now looking for less expensive clothes in stores like K-Mart.

Kathy Kearney, a Home Economics assistant professor in the Fashion Design department said that in regard to clothes, "women are a lot smarter than they used to be."

In some classes, Kearney said that she has seen an interest in more fitting clothes and skirts in varying lengths.

She added that curves are back and that there will be a great deal of black and black leather looks.

Kearney's studies have included historical and cultural research which enhances her teaching and provides important information for sharing in publication, she said.

Kearney has found that "every culture has their own concept of what is fashionable and what is beautiful," she said.

Some of her research has included trim on the Nez Perce Wing Dress and many aspects of hats, which she noted will be required wearing soon because of the hole in the ozone layer.

She has also done a lot of weaving and has created pieces of wearable art in this medium.

Investigating accessories on the Palouse

By DEANN NORTHAM
Staff Writer

All kinds of accessories are showing up on the UI campus this fall. Just by walking to and from class, it is possible to see the styles men and women are wearing, and the ways they are worn.

Amanda Fuller, the manager of the Limited Inc. in Spokane said that pendants and ties are extremely popular this year for women. She said women wear ties less conservatively than men. While men wear the tie up at the neck, women tend to leave the first two buttons of their shirts undone, and wear the tie loosely.

Scarves for women are not as popular as they used to be, but Fuller said animal prints, like leopard or zebra stripes, are showing up on scarves this fall.

Fuller said another noticeable change in accessories is earrings. Women are more likely to be wearing only one earring in an ear, possibly a big button style earring that covers up any other holes. However, she said that if two earrings are worn, the top earring is normally left in permanently.

Also showing up on women in Spokane are backpacks, which are selling well according to Fuller.

Kristen Warwick, at the Bon Marche in Moscow said opaque tights were in. Scarves have not sold well in Moscow either. The big things at the Bon are braided leather belts and baseball caps with denim tops and felt bills.

Colored jewelry is out. Now sterling silver and gold jewelry is being worn. Novelty necklaces are starting to show up. These are black ribbons or ropes with gold or silver fixtures hanging from them, like hearts or stick figures.

At the Eddie Bauer Outlet in Spokane, men are buying thick cotton socks. Bryan Larson said men tend to wear creams, tans, and darker colored socks with Birkenstocks. Men are also buying fleece-lined and wool gloves, and fisherman's hats.

Nicole Thiel at the Bon said college men are wearing wildlife ties. "Ties are less conservative now than ever," said Thiel.

Another new idea for men is the "tie hanger" rather than the tie tack. These hold ties down, but prevent them from buckling and flapping when men lean over.

Guys are buying Mambosok 100 percent headgear from the Bon, and traditional leather-woven belts.

Another thing that is being seen more than ever on campus is earrings on men. Earrings in the left ear are still the thing, with studs and tiny hoops being the most popular.

Accessories are not for any particular group of people, say business people, students, or professors. Accessories are for "...someone who wants to dress current and forward. Someone who wants to look good," said Fuller.

New York fashions? Not here in Moscow

Commentary by Jackie Woods

Flipping through the October issue of Mademoiselle, I found myself wondering if any real women (meaning ones who weigh more than a shoebox and are not six feet tall) actually wear these fashions.

Sure, someone from New York may find the occasion to wear black leather hot pants, a red ankle length slip dress, or a spandex, curve hugging jumpsuit, but do these represent fashions in Moscow, Idaho?

Pondering this question, I ventured out on my quest to find what fashions are popular on campus.

Angela Madel, a senior in Organizational Communication, doesn't think there is one distinct fashion this year.

"It's interesting, because you'll see some people out walking around campus really hippied out and then you see them on Friday night all decked out looking like they came out of a Vogue magazine," explained Madel.

Madel said there is a specific college style that appears regardless of the fashions that are in the stores or magazines.

"I think that whenever you get on a college campus you find people, especially younger college students, wanting to try and find themselves so their clothing reflects that...a lot of times its a statement," said Madel.

Madel sees a lot of J. Crew and Gap looks on campus, plus lots of jeans, Birkenstocks and sweat-shirts for a variety of styles.

Christy Goff, a freshman in Wildlife, also thought there is a wide spectrum of fashion statements on campus.

"One minute I'll walk by somebody wearing old levis, burks and a t-shirt, then I'll walk by a girl wearing a matching polka dot uniform with high heels. There's alot of variety which is good," said Goff.

Asked about her beaded necklaces, Goff agreed the style was probably sixties influenced, but that is not why she wears them.

"I wear my beads because they have meaning," said Goff. "I either make it myself, or my friends make it for me as a gift. I would never buy a bead necklace like this at the store."

Jennifer Brook, a junior transfer student in Forestry, said the U of I mixture of styles is different than Alfred University in New York where she last attended. "I went to an art school, so this is very unlike my old school where everybody was tie-dyed and peace dressed," explained Brook.

Both Goff and Brook thought Tevas (velcro sandals) and Birkenstocks were the most popular items on campus.

Lanie Lewis, a freshman in Child Development, said styles on campus seem really laid back. "I think in the fashion magazines it's more pretentious than it is here," said Lewis. "There's definitely no pressure to conform and that is what's so cool about it because it is so relaxed."

Christi Dayley, a freshman in Political Science agrees, "I've seen a lot of girls with all one length hair and not much makeup, it's kinda a natural look which is cool. They're a lot wilder in fashion magazines, like body suits, and you just don't see girls wearing that stuff very often."

Dayley said Tevas are really popular because they are "such comfortable shoes."

My trek around campus led me to the revelation that on this campus, fashion wise, anything goes. Which is good news for someone who had to ask what a Teva was before typing this story.

'Mostly Moscow' season debuts Wednesday

By JACKIE WOODS
Staff Writer

After many long hours and lots of hard work, the first segment of the student produced show, Mostly Moscow, will air Wednesday night.

Lynn Major, the show's producer, said although the show is completely run by students, it is a top quality production.

"People have said to me that the TV show Mostly Moscow, done by students at the U of I, is a better, smoother thirty-minute program than one done by a TV station that's just 35 miles to the south of us," said Major. "And to me that's the best compliment because they're suppose to be a professional station and we're still students."

Shawn Barigar, the host of Mostly Moscow, agreed that the experience of working on the show is invaluable.

"I think that's something that is really overlooked at the U of I telecom program. Some people think 'Oh, it's a small program so I am not going to get any experience.' Well that's the benefit, it is a small program so you get hands on experience," said Barigar.

All aspects of the show are handled by students in the Communication 478, Advanced TV Production class. The class is divided into partners, who are assigned stories and required to do the interviewing, shooting and editing for a story. The program airs locally every other Wednesday night at 7:30 p.m. on channel 8, but there is never really a break between shows.

"As soon as the show goes off the air Wednesday night, we'll be handing out stories for the next show, and Thursday people will start shooting," said Major.

Pete Slisz, a newcomer to the show this semester, said although it's been hectic, he has enjoyed the challenge of putting together a segment.

"We've got strict deadlines, but it's getting you ready to go out in the real working business world," said Slisz. "It's definitely not like your basic speech class."

All the students, except Major, Barigar and the director, Kendall Kaiser, are new to the show this semester, so the group will have a dress rehearsal Tuesday before the live show is aired. In between the taped stories, Barigar is live introducing the next segment, or giving updates on what is going on around the Palouse.

"I think the thing I am most nervous about is if anything happens behind the scenes I have to cover. Like if the tape were to break it comes back to me," said Barigar.

Major agrees the pressure is on the host.

"He's live, not memorex. He's got to be real quick on his feet and basically just shoot the poop for however long it takes to get the backup reel rolling," said Major.

As producer, Major has added two directed study students to the crew this semester to handle public relations and advertising for the show.

"One thing I tried to do this semester is get more community involvement by selling this show like any other business," explained Major.

It appears to be working, as Mykelbust will supply clothes for the host, Ken's Stationery is supplying poster equipment, Kinkos is donating 600 copies for flyers, and Jeff's Foods is running promos on their reader board before each show. Additionally, Gambino's and Pepsico have agreed to supply pizza and cola for the crew after every show.

Major is thankful for the local community help, but feels the University backing is on the lean side.

"I don't think they (the admininistration) realize how much time, effort and talent it takes to put this show on the air," said Major. "I think if they paid a little closer attention to how much work we really do, and that this is a good statement on the education we're getting from the school, that maybe we'd get more money for equipment and support staff."

Major feels the administration needs to realize that the research facility for telecom students is having the equipment and technology available for putting on Mostly Moscow.

"You can't replace the experience with reading it from a book," explained Major.

Dads kick up their heels

By KIM BLEDSOE
Staff Writer

Over 400 fathers registered for the second annual UI Dad's Weekend, according to the SARb Dad's Weekend chairperson Shane Brown, which was nearly double the amount that registered last year.

Dads took the opportunity to dine with President Zinser and listen to world champion decathlete and former UI student Dan O'Brien speak Friday evening. There were around 285 people in attendance and Brown said the dinner was "extremely successful."

"We had strong participation at the dinner and hopefully next year we'll be able to get as interesting a speaker as Dan O'Brien was," Brown said.

Dads were kept busy with a variety of activities, including the "Pass and Punt" held on the practice field outside the Kibbie Dome. Fathers who were able to throw a football through a tire and punt the ball long distances received sweatshirts or $100 gift certificates from the Palouse-Empire Mall.

"Some of the old quarterbacks that came back really enjoyed the Punt and Pass- they had a great time," Brown said.

The Weber State vs. Idaho kicked off with the "Family Football Festival" also held at the practice field, which included a barbecue and games.

In addition to the festivities, there was an all-campus competition for living groups participating in the Dad's Weekend events. The Gamma Phi Beta sorority took first place for the second year in a row, winning a dinner with UI football coach John L. Smith and two football players. Second place went to the Delta Gamma sorority. Alpha Gamma Delta won third place.

"I thought it was really neat winning Dad's weekend because it shows how supportive our families are in supporting UI and Gamma Phi Beta," freshman Gamma Phi and UI cheerleader Chris Campbell said.

Living groups and dads weren't the only winners over the weekend. UI student Jason Greenwood's 500-word piece about his father won the essay competition for Dad's Weekend. It was chosen out of seven submitted for the competition.

SARb and the University of Idaho is looking forward to Mom's weekend this spring and planning for next year's Dad's weekend.

"It was extremely successful and we're planning on improving the things we had this year," Brown said. "Hopefully we'll have more essays submitted."

Neil Young takes George by storm

By PETE GOMBEN
Associate Editor

Saturday night was a study in perfection at the Champs de Brionne winery amphitheater near George, Washington. The sunset melted into vivid orange and the breeze blowing off the Columbia River was just cool enough to merit the excuse of a blanket.

And, most importantly, Neil Young was performing a solo acoustic concert.

CONCERT REVIEW

Young began the show with his folksy standard "Comes a Time" and ended his encore with "After the Gold Rush," during which he played an old, gothic-looking organ. In between were 21 songs that chronicled his long career of singing and songwriting.

With his long, straight, wraith-like hair floating around his head in the light evening wind, Young was a hypnotist, mesmerizing the audience with insights into life. He sang about the pain of transition from adolescence into adulthood in "Old Man" and "Sugar Mountain," and the pitfalls of addiction in "The Needle and the Damage Done."

The playlist reads like a greatest hits album. Young sang "Heart of Gold," "Everyone Knows This is Nowhere" and "Helpless." He had no trouble adapting electric songs like "Powderfinger" and "Down by the River" to the acoustic format.

Throughout the show Young exhibited his skill by moving effortlessly from strumming one of his many guitars to picking a banjo on "Love is a Rose," and from tickling the piano to playing the somber-sounding organ on "Like a Hurricane." He accompanied himself on the harmonica during every song.

It is difficult to say if Neil Young has so many followers because of his instrumental ability, his knack as a songwriter or his vocals. His singing voice, which always sounds reedy and as ready to snap as a dry twig, sounded especially brittle and attractive. Young enchanted many concertgoers who laid back in the grass amphitheater to watch the stars and absorb the music.

For the most part, Young let his music do the talking. However, he would occasionally ask the audience for requests and wander around the stage with an ear turned toward the crowd to hear the responses.

And responses there were, with dozens of songs being called out by the enthusiastic audience. Two men seated near the back screamed out "Cortez" in reference to Young's "Cortez the Killer." The men repeated the request between the next few songs until accepting defeat and settling back to listen.

During one of his trips across the stage, Young looked out at the throng and noted that the crowd reminded him a lot of himself, only that "some of you look a little more done than me, some look a little less."

His next album, titled Harvest Moon, is said to be a follow up to his Harvest album from the early 70s. Harvest Moon is scheduled for release in late October.

Donlon's one-man show a doggone good time

By KARIN MASON
Staff Writer

Now I know why my dog Chuck loves to go for a spin in the back seat of the car with his head out the window and his tongue hanging out.

It's not the same thrill as "Truck Dog" gets out of the back of his '81 Ford pick-up, but probably the same idea.

James Donlon enlightened everyone at the Hartung Theatre on Friday and Saturday nights about the way their dog's mind works with his presentation of "Truck Dog."

Using a simple set consisting of a couple of chairs, license plates, fans and a cooler with truck dog's Budweiser in it, Donlon posed as a scruffy dog that lives in the back of a truck with "a driver" to drive him around. He used insight and humor to tell of a typical truck dog's ways of thinking and observances of nature and mankind.

Although the play has been presented throughout the United States, Mexico and Canada, the

THEATRE REVIEW

Palouse provided the perfect audience for "Truck Dog." Comments after the show by viewers proved that more than one person in the audience has a real-life "Truck Dog."

Donlon's character could well be mistaken for a real dog. He definitely had barking, scratching and sleeping down, and by the laughter in the audience, it was obvious that his actions were accurate. The red bandana around his neck and brown, curly hair also aided in his portrayal of a dog.

During the play, "Truck Dog" overcame a snowstorm, a nightmare and even death, things every dog must go through. Donlon did an effective job dealing with these situations as a dog, however, the other environmental and societal problems were too well-hidden in the dialogue.

"Truck Dog" did offer one piece of sound advice, "Never lose face. Life is a fragile foundation."

Shenandoah to perform Friday for National American Indian Day

By ARIEL PLYWASKI
Contributing Writer

This Friday is National American Indian Day, and in celebration, Joanne Shenandoah will perform at the Administration Auditorium at 7 p.m.

Shenandoah is a Wolf Clan member of the Oneida Nation, and has grown up with the music and the traditional ways of the Iroquois people.

Diane Allen, coordinator for minority student services, said Shenandoah uses humor, storytelling and other techniques to enhance her singing. Allen said she likes Shenandoah's music because "I can relate to it... (she sings) about who we are today."

Allen said Shenandoah's songs focus on the imperfect as well as the perfect parts about Native American life. Her songs have covered love and traveling as well as alcoholism.

Shenandoah has requested that any drummers who attend the show be ready to perform, and she is encouraging audience participation.

Shenandoah's songs and stories have taken her all over the United States and France. Her ability to blend ancient and contemporary musical styles contain messages of peace among nations and the need for harmony with all elements of Creation.

Shenandoah appeared two years ago on the WSU campus. "We certainly enjoyed listening to her," said Barbara Aston, coordinator for minority student services at WSU. Aston said she has an unusual sound that comes from a mix of traditional instruments and storytelling ability. Allen said that this show will be of great interest to children and adults.

Tickets cost $7 for adults, and $5 for persons under 18. For ticket information, contact Diane Allen at Student Advisory Services, 885-7058.

Christopher Columbus wrote, "I am a most unworthy sinner, but I have cried out to the Lord for grace and mercy, and they have covered me completely. I have found the sweetest consolation since I made it my whole purpose to enjoy His marvelous presence. For the execution of the journey to the Indies, I did not make use of intelligence, mathematics or maps. It is simply the fulfillment of what Isaiah had prophesied.."

GOVERNOR'S OFFICE INTERNSHIPS

Available to qualified students: 1993 legislative internships in the Idaho Governor's Office in Boise. Emphasis will be placed on monitoring the activities of legislative committees and working with the governor's staff on critical issues.

The internship is full-time and the total time involvement would be from the convening of the 52nd Idaho Legislature, First Regular Session on January 11, 1993, until Legislative adjournment in early April, 1993. The internship includes a $100/week stipend to cover expenses. Academic credits are available at the rate of one credit per fifty hours worked (to be arranged through your academic department).

If interested, please contact Will Simons, the Intern Coordinator, at the Office of the Governor, State Capitol, Boise, Idaho, 83720, or at (208) 334-2100. Interviews will be arranged on your campus after October 1, 1992, and final selections will be announced by Governor Andrus by November 20, 1992.
