Cove-Mallard gridlock continues

Coalition files appeal to stop timber sales

Zachary Craig-Works
Staff Writer

The controversy over the fate of Cove-Mallard timber sales continues. The Cove-Mallard areas of the Nez Perce National Forest, near Dixie, are part of the Salmon-Selway Ecosystem, which is the largest remaining roadless area in the lower 48 states. Idaho has more than 10 million acres of roadless areas remaining.

The U.S. Forest Service has attempted to open up this area to logging. This attempt has been blocked by a court injunction in response to a lawsuit filed by the Idaho Sportsmen's Coalition in October of 1993. The suit charged the Forest Service with violations of the Endangered Species Act, the National Environmental Policy Act, the National Forest Management Act and the Clean Water Act.

At the recent Wilderness Awareness Week held on the UI campus, the Cove-Mallard Coalition presented its side of the argument. The Coalition is made up of environmental and conservation groups that share an interest in protecting the Cove-Mallard area. The Coalition includes groups such as the Friends of the Earth, Friends of the Clearwater, the Idaho Sporting Congress, the Idaho Non-Violent Wilderness Area Rescue and Defense (INWARD) and Earth First!

"No more roads. That's our main goal," said Coalition Spokesman Wade Gruhl. "Road building is actually worse than logging, as far as sedimentation in streams goes. The roads—once they're there—keep putting sediment in the streams for years and years, and they don't ever really stop," Gruhl stated. This sediment, Gruhl claimed, destroys fish spawning grounds.

According to Gruhl, if the Coalition does not win the suit in Idaho courts, it will appeal its case to a higher court.

"There's a good chance we might lose it (the case) in the Idaho courts, just because of the cronyism that goes with Idaho. All of the judges went to school with the guys who are running the timber companies, most likely," Gruhl said. "We don't expect much of a fair shake. But if we appeal it to a higher court after that, we think we'd win for sure, because they (the Forest Service) have blatantly broken so many laws."

Coalition member Brett Clubbe believes the injunction has already had an effect. "I think it has already put a lot of pressure on the Forest Service," Clubbe said. Since the granting of the injunction, the Forest Service has been unable to take any action inside the Cove-Mallard area aside from standard maintenance.

Native Americans receive legal aid

Law students get temporary licenses to practice litigation in tribal courts

Tim Helmke
Contributing Writer

Native Americans who are charged with crimes on the Nez Perce and Coeur d'Alene reservations now have representation thanks to a UI College of Law program.

Four third-year UI law students are part of the College of Law's Indian Clinic which helps to represent Native Americans as they go before tribal courts. This clinic will be the focus of a University Roundtable discussion today from 12:30 to 1:20 p.m. in the Student Union Silver and Gold Rooms.

Anne Dwelle, a partner in the firm of Liston-Wakefield and Dwelle and a visiting associate professor of law, will be the main speaker.

For the past four years, Dwelle has supervised the UI Indian Clinic program. She is a graduate of Carlton College in Northfield, Minn., and the UI College of Law.

This presentation comes shortly after a new project was finalized between the UI College of Law and Idaho Legal Aid Services, Inc. The project will get law students involved in providing legal services to Idaho's six Indian tribes.

The Indian Justice Project has been given a $62,200 award for the 1994-95 school year from the Legal Services Corporation. The award was one of 17 granted nationwide. Third-year law students will participate in the program aimed to expand the legal representation of tribal members who are in the low-income range. This representation is for use in tribal, state and federal courts.

The law students involved in the program will be able to obtain limited licenses to practice law. They will do this under the supervision of Robert McCarthy, director of ILAS' Indian Law Unit. Students will receive eight credits for their participation in the program, five this fall and three in the spring.

Participating students had to go through an extensive week of trial advocacy training in August

Fathers flock to UI for football, golf

Adam Gardels
Staff Writer

Fathers of UI students will blanket the campus this Friday and Saturday in this year's Dad's Day Weekend.

Dads and their students will have many competitions and events in store for them. Friday night starts the weekend with a bang with Gary Hunter, vice president for Business Operations and legal counsel for the NBA Nuggets, as a special guest at a dinner. Hunter is also well known for his contributions to UI as Athletic Director of the Vandals from 1988-92.

Coffee and donuts will be served before the nine-hole golf tournament Saturday at 7:30 a.m. The first, second and third place golf teams will receive gift certificates ranging from $25 to $100.

The high score wins one bucket of range balls as well as a free golf lesson with UI golf pro Don Rasmussen.

A pre-game party for the Vandal football game will be held at the golf course at 11:30 a.m. UI will host Stephen F. Austin University at 1:05 in the Kibbie Dome. A post-game party will be held at the University Inn.

"There is (a) competition between living groups for attendance and a banner," said Amy Johnson, co-chair of Dad's Day. Points are awarded for registering dads and for having the best Dad's Day banner displayed. The living group with the most points will win the coveted traveling trophy.

Dad registration forms can be picked up and dropped off at the Alumni center. Last minute registrations will be held at the Student Union Friday from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m., Saturday from 8 to 11 a.m. or at Friday night's dinner and Saturday's golf tournament.

An essay contest is being held to see who should be "Dad of the Year."

"The essay is a 300 to 500 word essay," said Heather Greif, co-chair of Dad's Day. The winning essay will garner a UI sweat shirt and plaque awarded to the father of the winning student at Saturday's game on the 50-yard line. Essay forms can be picked up at the Alumni center or the SAS office. All essays must be returned to the Alumni office before 3 p.m. on Saturday.

Considering all the events and fun, Johnson stressed that, "It's a time to just hang out with your dad and show him what campus life is like."

FLORENCE, Ala.—When University of North Alabama incoming freshmen dialed a toll-free number this summer for information about their new school, they were greeted by a soft, sultry voice that purred, "Hello, sexy."

It seems a typo on a brochure distributed at freshmen orientation instructed incoming students to call 1-800-UNA-TALK, the One-on-One Live Sex Line, instead of 1-800-TALK-UNA, the university's information line. Callers expecting a helpful school employee got quite a shock. "Let me make those fantasies come true," said the female voice at the other end of the line.

While that's probably enough information to prompt many male high school seniors to send in their application, it's not exactly what UNA officials had in mind.

The school sent out letters apologizing to students and their parents, and included the school's correct phone number for their information line.

to prepare for the program. Kenneth Gallant, UI College of Law director of clinical programs, served as supervisor for the training.

Ernesto G. Sanchez, Idaho Legal Aid Services executive director, said in a prepared statement that the project would not have been possible without the special LSC funding.

He also said every effort will be made to continue the project beyond this year. Sanchez said the project has received strong support from Idaho tribes, the Idaho State Bar and Idaho Governor Cecil Andrus.

Dwelle's presentation, "No Right to Counsel," is the first in the fall series of University Roundtables. Dr. Suzane Loker, professor and director of the UI School of Family and Consumer Sciences, will serve as moderator for the event. Anyone wishing to participate is encouraged to attend. People are welcome to bring a sack lunch and beverages will be for sale.

The ILAS project has a toll-free telephone number which is accessible from Idaho's Indian reservations. The toll-free number is 1-800-293-6315.

Student sues college over roommate

Marco Buscaglia

College Press Service

READING, Pa. - Trails of half-eaten Pop Tarts. Piles of dirty clothes the size of Mt. Olympus. The same Pink Floyd song played over and over and over again. Ask almost any college student, and they probably have a roommate horror story to tell.

Robert Babula does, and he plans to tell it to a judge.

Babula, 18, is suing Albright College, claiming his dormitory roommate was so abusive that he was forced to drop out of the small, Methodist college after only two months. He is seeking $150,000 in damages against the 1,100-student college, which he alleges failed to provide adequate security or respond to his complaints about his assigned roommate.

According to court documents, Babula's roommate was "a football player who did not study, who regularly engaged in loud and raucous behavior, who kept late hours and who kept loud and raucous company." The roommate also freely disclosed the code to the combination lock on their dormitory room, allowing students Babula did not know to enter his room, says his attorney, Jim Cavanaugh.

"My client's roommate gave out their combination to his friends," Cavanaugh says. "There were people Mr. Babula didn't know in and out of his dorm room all day and all night long."

Once, when Babula left his room, he returned to find students had taken the mattress from his bed, thrown it under a running shower and urinated on it, says Cavanaugh. On another occasion, Babula was awoken by students who entered his room and threatened him with lead pipes. Yet another night, a masked student brandishing a blow torch came into his room.

Essentially, Babula's roommate was the exact opposite of the quiet, studious roommate that Babula had requested on Albright's roommate compatibility form, says Cavanaugh. "Albright College ignored Babula's questionnaire," he says. "If the school had housed him with someone who was more compatible, I'm sure this would have never happened."

Babula began the 1992 fall semester filled with high expectations, says Cavanaugh. According to Cavanaugh, the Glen Gardner, N.J., resident had chosen Albright because of its academic program and security, the latter which was continually stressed at the school's freshman orientation.

"The school did not protect its student," says Cavanaugh. "The lack of security is particularly grievous since the school billed itself as extremely secure."

John Devlin, attorney for Albright College, says the charges against the school and the student are false. "This is a disgruntled student situation, nothing more," he says. "There was a personality clash between the two. No alcohol was involved, no criminal acts, no police action. It's just two people that couldn't get along."

According to the lawsuit, Babula often complained to security, but his concerns were never acknowledged. His requests to the dean of housing for a new room assignment went unanswered. "These were criminal actions that happened again and again because the school would not take any appropriate steps to prevent them," says

Cavanaugh. "When he went to school authorities, nothing was done."

Babula decided to drop out of Albright after two months. He says he developed a stress disorder because of the problems with his roommate. He has since enrolled at Rutgers University and is commuting to class.

Because Babula was a student living in the dorms, Cavanaugh says it was Albright's responsibility to make sure he was protected. "If you live off-campus, you have to provide your own food, housing and security," he says. "If you live on-campus, it's contracted that that is provided to you."

Devlin disagrees. "We have no written record of Mr. Babula's complaints. Since this is simply a situation involving different personalities, what can the school do?" he asks. "Albright is an institution of higher learning. They are there first and foremost to provide an education. If there is a clash between two students, the students should work it out on their own."

Although Cavanaugh acknowledges Babula sought psychiatric help after leaving the school, he denies that his client left Albright on the advice of a psychiatrist. "Mr. Babula did not see a psychiatrist while he was a student at Albright," Cavanaugh says. "He left after he realized it was dangerous for him to remain there. He did not wish to leave, but he had no other choice."

While Devlin maintains that the school is not at fault, he is confident the case will be settled out of court. "We want to resolve this situation amiably," Devlin says. "Both parties are good students and deserve to have this resolved."

Argonaut Interview

Sullivan campaigns for state superintendent seat

Shannon Paterson
Staff Writer

Willie Sullivan is the Democratic candidate for Idaho State Superintendent of Public Instruction. Sullivan earned a B.A. in Elementary Education Administration and a Master's degree in Education Administration from Albertson College of Idaho.

Sullivan has served as chair of the Legislative Committee for the State Association of School Administrators, president of the Idaho Education Association, and chair of the Governor's Task Force on State Correctional Education. He currently holds a seat on the State Professional Standards Commission and is a member of the Idaho Association of School Administrators, Idaho Education Association, Idaho Association of Secondary School Principals, Idaho Association of Elementary School Principals and Kiwanis International.

Argonaut: What kind of experiences do you have that you think will make you an effective state superintendent?

Sullivan: I've been chairman of the Professional Standards Commission of Idaho—I was on the commission for 7 years. I've been president of the State Teachers Association and the Legislative Chairman for the Administrators Association. I was appointed by Governor Evans to do the evaluation of the State Penal Education system and then was involved in the evaluation of the teacher education programs of all of the major colleges and universities in the state of Idaho.

Those are some of the major things I've done. I have also been involved in developing the recommendation for funding through the Funding Coalition along with the state superintendent in the past on several occasions.

Argonaut: What is your position on sex education in the schools?

Sullivan: There is a need for some comprehensive sex education. In my program, we've done an abstinence-based program but included in that information concerning contraceptives and protection from sexually transmitted diseases. You have to provide young people with appropriate information to help them make good decisions about whether to become sexually active or not. If they are, then they need to have information to keep them from getting sexually transmitted diseases and that sort of thing.

Argonaut: What is your stand on Proposition One?

Sullivan: I'm very much against it.

Argonaut: Why?

Sullivan: It's a situation where what we're trying to put into effect here is something that is going to legislate inequality. We don't want to do that. It's another McCarthy-type witchhunt. When you put into law that certain people can be discriminated against for employment, who's next?

Argonaut: If Proposition One passes, do you think there will be any impact on state curriculum guidelines?

Sullivan: I don't know that it will actually affect the curriculum guidelines per se, but it certainly would affect some of the literature that is utilized in some of our upper division English and literature classes in the high schools. It will affect how counselors can work with students. I bet libraries are going to have a significant effect upon what they can and cannot put out on the shelves. There are going to be some major effects. It's going to cost us a lot of dollars to defend it in court because it will be challenged.

Argonaut: What do you think those effects on the counselors only know of two school districts out of 112 that are using an outcome-based type program. We've been advocating a program called performance-based—which is somewhat different. My opponent has been saying this program is going to weaken educational standards; it's going to cause parents not to know how well their children are doing and that it will allow students who are top-notch students to fall behind because it will be slower paced for all students. It's absolutely not true.

That could happen if the system will be?

Sullivan: I think what it will boil down to is a counselor will have to decide, "Do I abide by this law and tell a student either I can't talk to you about homosexuality if you are having some problems in that area or tell them that it's bad and that they're bad people because they're involved."

Argonaut: Although outcome-based education is not all that common in Idaho, Anne Fox, your opponent, has made somewhat of an issue about it. What is your position on this?

Sullivan: It isn't very common in Idaho. I wasn't doing a good job of implementing performance-based or outcome-based education, but the intent is that all students will do a better job. We will provide clear direction for what we want to accomplish, we'll have very clear goals for teaching students what we want them to know. Then we will assess what they can and cannot do before they will be able to advance to the next level.

Argonaut: One of the complaints of educators is the lack of involvement our public schools. How would you go about enhancing this relationship?

Sullivan: That's one of the main things I think has to happen if we're going to improve our public education system, and it's going to have to happen at each individual school. We're going to have to re-invite parents back into the process; not just to the PTA meeting or the bake sale—but involve them in the decision-making process on curriculum, discipline policies and extra-curricular activities.

As state superintendent, I have to go out and encourage the administration of our schools to implement these policies, to get people involved. If it doesn't happen without legislation, then it's going to be my job to see that we legislate some sort of guaranteed involvement for parents.

You can set up advisory councils for each building. Let me give you an actual example that happened in my own building in Payette. We developed a new philosophy for our school, a set of goals and a mission statement. I went to the business people, the senior citizens' center, the people who have children in our school, and I invited some people from the community who don't have children in our school—we also had teachers and administrators—and we all sat down and started from scratch to develop a philosophy, goals and a short mission statement that says this is the essence of our school.

Argonaut: How do you think the Seahawks are going to do this year?

Sullivan: (Laughing) I think they're going to have a tough year.

Argonaut: Why do you think they'll have a tough year?

Sullivan: They fooled me; they beat the Raiders. I think they still have a way to go before they become a really top-flight team.

Argonaut: Do you think a statewide teacher salary scale is a good idea?

Sullivan: Having a minimum statewide salary is a good idea, but I don't like the idea of limiting a teacher's salary. If you live in Sun Valley, your needs are going to be a lot different than if you live in Payette. The cost of living is quite different from place to place. Having a minimum salary schedule certainly makes sense. Each community knows the needs their teachers are going to have to have.

Argonaut: Your opponent endorses using a school voucher system where parents can choose the school they send their kids to, be it public or private. What are your thoughts on such a system of schooling?

Sullivan: I'm very much against the voucher system. Our funding situation is such that we cannot afford to give up any of the dollars that go to public education if we truly want to make the improvements necessary in bringing more technology into our classrooms, reducing class loads and those kinds of things.

Also, if not a single additional student left public school to go to private schools, it would take hundreds of thousands of dollars to fund a voucher system just for the kids who are in private schools today. It would be a very costly proposition. We would either be taking money away from the public schools or we would be putting an additional tax burden on the taxpayer.

People say having vouchers would create competition for public schools. The myth of that is this: private schools and public schools do not operate in the same way. If you start giving public dollars to private schools, you're either going to have to attach the same kinds of strings you put on public schools to those private schools or they are still not going to be competing on the same playing field.

Private schools can be more selective about who they take—they have an option to choose family background academic history, behavioral history—all of those kinds of things can be included in making a decision about whether a child is included in a private school or not. Public schools take who comes to the door.

Argonaut: What do you intend to do to relieve overcrowding in public school classrooms?

Sullivan: We're going to have to fund our buildings to make sure we can keep up with the kind of growth we're facing. I would be willing to look at having election dates set so we could reduce the amount of the super majority it now takes to pass a bond issue. Right now it takes 66 and two-thirds percent—I would like to see that reduced so bonds have a better chance of passing. We might have to look at impact fees on growth—where new construction would be required to put up an impact fee to help buy ground for new schools and build new schools as the community grows.

Argonaut: Are you talking about new business or residential construction?

Sullivan: You would probably have to look at doing both if you're going to have it be very effective.

Argonaut: Recently SAT scores for Idaho students were reported to have improved. How do you intend to bolster this trend?

Sullivan: The only way they're going to continue to improve is if we provide a stronger system of public education for K-12. Part of the reason they have improved is that we are doing a better job of providing the coursework necessary for those students who are taking the SAT, PSAT and ACT. Unfortunately, only about 25 percent of the kids are going to graduate from college, so we also have to look at what we're doing for that other 75 percent of the kids. We have a lot of work to do in providing vocational preparation for kids who go on to technical school or to work right out of high school.

Argonaut: As university students we often hear how unprepared we are for college. Do think that this is an accurate assessment and if so, what can be done to change this?

Sullivan: In talking with some of the professors at Boise State and the University of Idaho, the picture I get is that it's not all students that are unprepared. One of the things I have been hearing is that it's the non-traditional student who really comes unprepared. I also have heard from parents and others that some of Idaho's students who go on to higher education institutions that are touted as being tough academically struggle in some areas. I've had others who have been very complimentary of the programs they've had and said they have been very well-prepared to meet the challenges of a rigorous academic program. It would depend on what district you come from as a K-12 student. I don't think I could generalize that we're not doing a good job in every school. There are areas of each high school that do a good job and some areas that could be improved. I could safely say that math and science are areas we certainly want to continue to improve.

Ihor Mereszczak, Forest Service Ecosystem Planning and Operations staff member, acknowledged that road building contributes to an increase in sediment in streams. "Most activities that do cause increases would be things like some of the road building," Mereszczak said. About 99 percent of the measurable increase of sediment in streams was from road building, he added. "We do lots of things to minimize that. That's why we're able to move forward with a lot of projects in that area."

The National Marine Fisheries Service has issued a biological opinion to Nez Perce National Forest representatives concerning projects on lands that drain into the Salmon River between Wind River and Sabe Creek. This opinion includes the Cove-Mallard area. The biological opinion is the NMFS's response to an assessment submitted by Forest representatives to meet requirements for endangered salmon species in accordance with the Endangered Species Act.

According to the NMFS opinion, the projects in the area showing increased sediment and stream temperatures could result in "incidental takings" of endangered salmon species. The opinion also recommends a more intensive monitoring plan to evaluate the effects of timber sales, grazing, mining and road-building on endangered salmon species.

According to Mereszczak, the Forest Service does not have to necessarily follow the recommendations of the opinion. "They're recommending deferral. We haven't really looked into it, as to what our plans would be, now that we have the biological opinion. It's not like you have to comply with every recommendation, but we're taking it seriously," Mereszczak said.

In response to the Coalition's accusations calling the Forest Service "an outlaw organization that routinely and blatantly violates its own laws," Mereszczak said, "It's name calling. You could look at somebody you don't like and call them a name."

Battle of the books: Who wins?

Marco Buscaglia
College Press Service

For years, disgruntled college students have questioned the high prices of textbooks. They grumble, they complain, but ultimately, they pay in hard cash.

While it's clear that the student customer is losing out, what is more difficult to determine is who's to blame for the cycle of soaring new textbook prices and low refunds for used books.

"We observed what appears to be the excessively high prices on textbooks that students are buying and the excessively low refunds on textbooks that are returned," says Michigan State legislator Kirk Profit, who has formed a committee to investigate pricing in the textbook industry.

Profit, whose constituency includes students from Michigan State, Eastern Michigan and three smaller colleges, says he formed the committee this spring after receiving many letters from students.

"We are trying to see who's responsible for the high prices and low refund rates," says Mildred Wilson, head of the committee. "It's obvious that the students are the victims."

But while students blame much of their textbook sticker shock on campus bookstores, other factors from the push for diversity to disorganized professors also determine why students are paying more for books.

Students often fume when textbooks that cost $60 at the beginning of the semester net only a small fraction of that when they're returned at the semester's end. Yet bookstore owners say they can only pay top dollar for used books they know they can sell.

"When college professors turn in their textbook lists late, it screws up everything," says Jason Intigo, an assistant manager at a campus bookstore in Austin, Texas. "The entire buy-back process depends on knowing what books will be used in the next semester, since we'll pay money for books we need, and we won't pay much for books we don't."

Intigo says that most bookstores will pay half of the original price when buying back textbooks if the book is going to be used in next semester's classes. But if a book is not on the next semester's list for academic use, stores buy it back for minimal amounts.

"Students turn their books into us, we pay them a few bucks because we don't think we're going to use them, and then they see them on the shelf for the next semester selling for $30," says Intigo, echoing the concerns of many students. "Unless we have a request from the professor, we don't know if the book is going to be used, and there's really nothing else we can do."

While Intigo acknowledges students get burned in the process, he says the same thing happens to bookstores as well. "We have professors who tell us they'll be using the book next semester and then change their minds," he says. "They either tell their students not to buy it because they won't need it, or they put together a packet of the most important information on their own."

While most students try to buy used textbooks for the majority of their classes, students often find that last year's textbook has been replaced by a newly updated edition.

"If I need a new version of a textbook, I usually try to see if I can go without it," says Melissa Whalen, a business major at the University of Illinois-Chicago, who adds that she saves about $100 a semester by buying used textbooks. "I'm not going to spend 50 bucks on something that I may hardly use."

But Aaron Williams, a University of Michigan senior, says he's noticed more and more new editions are hitting the book shelves. "Publishers are reprinting editions even though the information inside hasn't really changed," Williams says. "If you have three new editions of a text on something like ancient Greek history in six years, there's something wrong. Either ancient history is changing, or you have publishers eager to make more money."

Jim Lichtenberg, vice-president of the American Association of Publishers, says there are numerous reasons why publishers are putting out more new editions.

"We're living in a knowledge explosion. It's inevitable that textbooks are revised more frequently because the world is changing at an extraordinary pace," Lichtenberg says.

Diversity issues raised by educators and students are also a factor. "We are also changing the way we look at ourselves," Lichtenberg adds. "There are new sensitivities towards race, gender and ethnic backgrounds. If professors want to reflect that, they have to revise their textbooks."

However, Whalen maintains that often the changes are minimal. "I have gone page by page through some editions of textbooks and have only found differences in syntax and graphics," she says. "If there's some burning information out there that needs to be added, they should provide a supplement. It would be a lot cheaper than buying a whole new book."

But economics does play a part. "The sale of new books has dropped off sharply with the emergence of the used book market," Lichtenberg admits, adding that used textbooks account for $600 million of the $2 billion textbook market. "The market gets saturated with used books. Publishers have started to revise more often to make money off of their original investment."

In addition, developing textbooks is often a long and costly process. Some textbooks can take two years to develop and can cost publishers up to $2 million, says Lichtenberg. "There's no guarantee of success," he says. "You can sink a lot of money and time into a textbook that might never see the light of day."

The Association of American Publishers estimates that 25 cents of every dollar made from the sale of a new textbook goes to the college store which sold it. Of that, only 3.9 cents before taxes becomes store income, after freight, personnel and operations costs are covered.

The publisher makes 67.5 cents off of each dollar spent for a new textbook, but ends up with 7.6 cents per dollar after expenses. The author of the textbook makes 7.5 cents per dollar for each book sold.

Gary Shapiro, deputy executive director of the National Association of College Stores (NACS), says most college bookstores make the majority of their profit from merchandise, not books. "The sale of new textbooks is practically subsidized by the sale of other items," he says. "And the status of used books can change so frequently, it's hard to judge."

Shapiro has worked in the college bookstore industry all his life. Before coming to NACS, he owned a bookstore at the University of South Florida in Tampa. "A lot of the problems students have with bookstores are basically a perception problem," he says. "People think bookstore owners are making a ton of money off the students. The numbers people assume to be true are probably way off."

Georgia college rebuilds after flood

Marco Buscaglia
College Press Service

ALBANY, Ga.— This summer, Tropical Storm Alberto produced 20 inches of rain in 24 hours, causing the Flint River to overflow onto the ASC campus. At one point, 25 of 28 campus buildings were almost completely under water. Damage to the campus now exceeds $60 million, say administrators.

Incredibly, ASC officials say they plan to open on time in September despite the destruction caused by the flood. "We have a step-by-step process for rehabilitating and opening buildings," said Dr. Billy Black, ASC president. "We have brought in a professional team of national, state and local experts to coordinate the cleanup."

Summer classes were held in two buildings that were only slightly damaged. But with the regular load of students on the way, ASC officials know more buildings will be needed. "We will have a temporary set-up on campus and we'll be using some facilities in Albany and other towns nearby," said Jackie Ryan, spokesperson for the school. "We are expecting 3,600 students in the fall and somehow or another, we'll be ready for them."

Noah Long, who is working on the ASC site, says his firm is assessing the "severe damage" done to the campus and is making every effort to see that the buildings are being properly ventilated and decontaminated to meet safety standards.

"We know we have to gut ground floors and work with drowned utility systems, but the teams and the systems for recovery are in place, and we've developed a program to provide the temporary facilities for offices and classrooms," said Long.

One-third of ASC students live on campus, which makes finding temporary space for student housing that much more difficult. "Some of our dorms were damaged," said Ryan. "We do have one residence hall that is suitable for occupancy, and we are working to secure housing for all of our students."

Although the damage to the school is severe, Rosser and ASC officials are confident that the college will be restored to its former state. Because Albany was declared a disaster area by the government, the college will receive federal funding for repairs and reconstruction.

"We are trying to line up temporary facilities but at the same time we are planning for the future," said Rosser's Victor Maloof, adding that it could take years before reconstruction is complete.

U.S. House votes to cap Pell Grants

Plan limits the number of students who can receive financial aid as a temporary measure

Charles Dervarics
College Press Service

WASHINGTON—The U.S. House of Representatives voted to cap the number of students who can receive grants this academic year through the Pell Grant program, creating what some critics say will be a "first-come, first-served" system that may leave many needy students out in the cold.

The plan, voted on June 29, would limit the number of students who could obtain grants during the 1994-95 academic year to 3.9 million.

Proponents of the bill say that the plan, designed as a one-time budget-saving measure, still allows room for growth in the Pell Grant program. They note the 3.9 million ceiling is higher than the number of students expected to seek grants next year.

But Laura McClintock, legislative director of the United States Students Association, says the new cap "sets a very dangerous precedent" that may deny aid for low-income students.

"It's nothing but bad news for us," said McClintock. In the past, a lack of funds often limited the amount of a student's Pell Grant, but needy students always knew they would receive some assistance from the program, McClintock added.

The cap could especially hurt "open-access institutions" such as community colleges, where students often wait until summer to enroll for fall classes, say critics.

A "first-come, first-served" system would make it impossible for many of these students to receive aid, said Melanie Jackson, director of federal relations for the Association of Community College Trustees. "It would have a chilling effect," said Jackson.

According to a report filed with the bill when it passed the powerful House Appropriations Committee, "the cushion provided is adequate to cover all students under the latest estimate" of Pell Grant demand. The report said the cap is a one-time decision made solely in response to budget constraints.

But predicting the annual need for Pell Grants is a difficult process, McClintock said. Recessions and other economic upheavals often force more students to seek aid, while other students elect to go to college rather than look for jobs in a weak economy.

The cap is part of a massive bill to fund education, labor and human service programs in fiscal year 1995.

The bill's main sponsor acknowledged some elements of the measure are controversial but said his staff protected as many programs as possible within tight budget constraints.

"The bill does not make anyone completely happy," said Rep. Neal Smith (D-Iowa). "But I really believe that this is the best that we could do under the circumstances today."

Some of education's most prominent advocates in the House voiced serious concerns about the Pell Grant cap but reluctantly voted for the bill anyway.

"This bill fails to put money where Congress' mouth is," said Rep. Major Owens (D-NY). Owens called the bill an "embarrassment" to the president and Congress, labeling the Pell Grant cap "a misguided attempt to cut education costs."

With funding for more than 500 federal programs at stake, however, Owens said he would provide "reluctant support" for the measure.

Other legislators voiced similar concerns. "Under a cap, Pell becomes a race to the application gate," said Rep. Patt Williams (D-Mont.), vice chairman of the House Subcommittee on Postsecondary Education and Training.

"No matter how one looks at it, this is not a good student aid budget," Williams said.

The bill provided few increases for other student financial aid programs. College workstudy would receive $616 million next year, unchanged from current funding. However, President Clinton's budget had sought another $100 million for the program, much of it for new community service jobs.

House members also kept funding levels the same at $583 million for Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grants. Funding for State Student Incentive Grants would fall from $72 million to $54 million under the House plan.

However, the measure would restore more than $150 million in funding for federal Perkins Loans that were scheduled for cuts in the president's education budget.

Overall, President Clinton's new domestic initiatives helped crowd out funding for Pell Grants and other student aid programs, congressional aides said. For example, the bill allotted $388 million for the president's new Goals 2000 program to improve K-12 education in America. The measure also earmarked $280 million for a new program to help young people make the transition from academics to the workplace.

House members approved the bill by a vote of 339 to 89.

Also, in late July, the Senate Appropriations Committee approved a similar spending bill, mostly following the House of Representatives' recommendations to keep student financial aid spending at present levels. The full Senate is likely to vote on the measure sometime this month.

A House/Senate conference committee is expected to convene before Oct. 1 to reconcile differences between the two bills. The government's new fiscal year begins Oct. 1.

SPOKANE, Wash.—Nine students at Spokane Community College baked their way into the record books this summer with a 33,000-pound apple pie.

Spokane's commercial baking students began planning for the massive culinary project early in the year and baked the 50-by-30 foot pie in sections in the college bakery.

When finished, the pie included 15,000 pounds of apples, 5,500 pounds of flour, 3,800 pounds of shortening, 160 pounds of powdered milk, 150 pounds of salt, 2,200 pounds of sugar, 500 gallons of apple juice, 25 pounds of cinnamon, 410 pounds of instant clear gel and 15 pounds of nutmeg.

"It was a once in a lifetime opportunity," says Harry Wibisono, who oversaw the project. "It was good for the school and good for the students."

The students' pie easily beat Britain's Hewitt Farm's former pie record of 30,115 pounds.

After a representative of The Guinness Book of Records confirmed the size at Spokane County's Neighbor Days Independence Celebration, students cut the pie into 40,000 pieces and sold them to the fair-goers for $1.

REFRESHMENTS SERVED!

Let's re-elect Jimmy Carter

In his second diplomatic success this year, Carter has convinced the Haitian dictators to step down from power. Granted, they did not have much of a choice—either step down or face annihilation.

What is bothersome is the fact that the style of diplomacy Carter has been using with such great success this last year has been almost an afterthought on the part of the Clinton administration.

The Washington politicians, although some have served with great distinction in the military (one notable exception being Clinton), should be willing to try every feasibly possible diplomatic maneuver before asking our troops to give their lives for their country. What must also be examined are the justifications for asking the military to do this.

The argument that it is an ideal (democracy, in this case) worth restoring is hogwash. If the U.S. is going to go around restoring democracies the world over, or taking down governments with histories of civil rights abuses, then the military has its work cut out for it. Policies should be applied consistently or not at all.

Many may argue that the economic sanctions did not work against Haiti, and it took a sizable show of military force—and the threat to use it—before Cedras and his compadres could be convinced to step down and allow democracy to be restored. This may be true.

However—and this is the important part—this apparent bluff was never Clinton's intention. What he intended to do was to invade Haiti. His closest advisors were surprised by Clinton's last minute call to Carter to ask him to try his hand at diplomacy. What is even worse is the fact that, despite public opinion polls showing a distinct disapproval of an invasion, the administration was going ahead with the invasion.

Gen. John Shalikashvili, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said Sunday morning on "Meet the Press," that the public opinion would likely swing in favor of military intervention once the invasion was underway. According to the Chairman, the American public has a historical habit of doing this. Perhaps. One of the reasons this may happen is because the public doesn't want the troops to feel alienated upon their return. A good example is the Persian Gulf war. A lot of bumper stickers could be found in nearly every city in America saying "Support Our Troops."

What the politicians need to start thinking about is the fact that even though the military may have fought a good war and the polls look good for the next election, it still won't bring back the lives of those who died fighting it. It's even worse if the war wasn't worth fighting in the first place.

Beware of real gear freaks

I shout, "Guess what?" at my housemate. "I bought a rock climbing harness!" I am so excited I can't wait for him to fully wake up so he could behold my first official gear purchase.

He slowly rubs the sleep from his eyes and asks me, "What kind is it?"

Uh, oh. Crisis. I don't know what kind it is.

"It's purple, blue... and I got it on sale," I reply, confident that would satisfy him.

"You don't know what kind it is? Why would you buy it if you don't even know what kind it is?" he asks me disbelievingly.

I knew then that I was fooling myself. I was dealing with a card carrying, dues paying, oath swearing gear freak. There was no way that I could purchase anything that would impress him. I mumbled something about homework and slunk back to the safety of my room to contemplate my mistake. Where did I go wrong? How could I have been so stupid? Will he ever talk to me again?

He is usually pretty patient with me, but I can tell there are times when he wonders what planet I am from. I know I spend A LOT of time wondering what planet he is from. It has come to the point that we can't even talk about jackets, fleece, or Gore-Tex without getting into an argument.

Commentary Jennifer Swift

I know that this problem is not confined to my house. I have met other gear freaks whenever I make the mistake of trying to buy anything involving the outdoors. I hate going into gear stores. The people that work there have the worst attitudes. I can tell their patience runs thin with me. I am, after all, just another ignoramus who doesn't know North Face from the North Pole.

Consequently, my gear collection is an embarrassment to my housemate.

This is the part where he comes in very handy, however. He's really cool about lending me his stuff. It's great. It's like having my own personal outfitter. He does tend to get carried away though. I can't just borrow his tent; I have to bring the vestibule, groundcloth, matching cookware, and a flashlight that I'm supposed to strap to my head. Plus, I need his Gore-Tex jacket with hot-taped inseams, water bottle pockets on the inside, billed hood and armpit zippers. All of this comes in flashy neon blue. Great. If I get lost, there is no way the search party will miss me wearing that thing.

After living with a gear freak for two months I have learned a few things about what it takes to become part of this elite group.

1. If it isn't the most expensive jacket, boots, etc., it's worthless.
2. The more obnoxious the color, the better.
3. All clothing has a title. The best ones have "expedition" or "cold-weather" somewhere in there.
4. All gear freaks climb, but not all climbers are gear freaks.
5. Gear freaks are defensive about the latest piece of equipment they have acquired. This usually leads to a one hour lecture

Crossing a Moscow street takes guts, raw guts

A couple days ago I was heading to campus when I came to Third Street. I was in a cross walk and the traffic was heavy. I had my bike, which I had dismounted as all good bicyclists do before attempting a pedestrian crossing. I scanned the horizon. Things looked bleak.

The cars kept coming and coming and nobody would stop. Finally, a young woman stepped up to the point of entry on the crosswalk on the other side of the street. Pedestrians huddling in groups tend to have better success rates, so I was pleased to see this. She scanned the horizon. Things looked bleak.

Suddenly a tiny gap opened up on her side, and while the cars didn't slow, she shot into the gap. I admired her daring. The car on her side of the road reacted by slowing down a mile or two.

The cars on my side of the road continued to race by. She was forced to stop in the middle of the road, cars now whizzing by on either side of her.

Coming Up For Air Chris Miller

I thought a car was going to run her down.

Four more cars cruised through before she found another gap. Like Sherriden May dodging UNLV defenders, she cut through the line and leapt for home base, otherwise known as the sidewalk.

I admired her daring. She looked up at me as she passed and said smiling, "They just don't know the rules."

Wow, I thought. She has guts. Raw guts.

I waited another half an hour, then crossed when a lady in a huge gray Buick with a dent in the front end stopped.

As I understand it, there is a law in Moscow that basically says, "Motorists must yield to pedestrians—especially when they're in crosswalks!" That's what all those signs are for. To not stop for a pedestrian is a ticketable offense, one that costs about $47.

According to Moscow Police Lieutenant Jake Kershisnik, pedestrians must step off the curb and actually enter the crosswalk before the police can ticket the offense.

Apparently, few drivers and pedestrians know this.

Drivers don't stop, and pedestrians either don't realize they have to leap right in or are afraid to do so.

I don't think most of the offenders are out-of-state students who just don't know how to drive in a small city, though the thought has crossed my mind.

Likewise, I don't think the offenders are all stupid, egocentric idiots, though the thought has crossed my mind.

After careful scrutiny of drivers' faces as they whirred blissfully by, I found that approximately half of them simply didn't have a clue. Their expressions were either blank or seizure-like as they sang along with their radios.

The other half look directly at you, the pedestrian, and see into your very eyes. They note your presence, know they should stop, but don't.

Sometimes someone seems like he is sorry he didn't stop while you stood there in the rain, but not sorry enough to do something about it.

To combat this ignorance, I've come up with a few tips for both drivers and pedestrians.

First, everyone should know where the problem areas are. Third Street from Main Street to the state border is almost impossible to cross, except at the traffic light near the out-of-business Jeff's Foods store. The one-way, three-laners of Washington and Jackson are also difficult. I think most drivers see three lanes and think, "FREEWAY! FREEWAY! I'm gonna open this baby up and purr at 65 mph!"

Fortunately, traffic lights periodically create openings.

The last two places are where Highway 8 enters town and Highway 95 leaves town. During lunch hour or rush hour pedestrians need extra fortitude and a PowerBar to get across.

Second, drivers need to look out for pedestrians and stop. This doesn't mean stop only when not in a hurry, this means "stop now."

Third, nothing makes me want to rev the engine in my pickup and slam it into 4-low than a pedestrian moseying along at a leisurely pace as if a line of cars weren't waiting on him to get his fat rear to the other sidewalk. Pedestrians need to learn how to hustle.

It's the polite thing to do.

Last, all of us pedestrians could drive to work or school and clog up traffic and slow everybody down. It sure is easier than getting across the street.

about the pros and cons of this particular thing as opposed to the one that cost $50 less.

I am not trying to say that gear freaks are by nature jerks. As a matter of fact, they can be fun and interesting. Interesting, that is, if you live, eat and breathe fleece. The ones that I have personally known tend to treat anyone who doesn't own expedition gear as a bit stupid. I don't mind a few pointers on what is the best quality for my money, but give me a break, I'm not planning on climbing Everest any time soon.

So, to all the gear freaks of the world, have a little patience with us who are simply in need of a winter jacket. We don't necessarily need the billed hood, or hot-taped inseams, or even inside water bottle pockets. We just want to know which one will prevent us from looking stupid while in the company of card carrying, dues paying, oath swearing gear freaks.

Out of state costs too high

The state of Idaho exports 22 percent of its college students (a major portion of these to Utah schools). I believe it would be provident if Idaho leadership would bring in the same number of college students from other states. California this year exported around 5 percent; Oregon and Washington, 8 percent and 9 percent.

Over the years since I left UI, I have often visited my peers at alumni meetings and ball games. We discuss the fact that when we graduated, Idaho's income came from natural resources and there were few jobs for college graduates. So Idaho exported many of our brightest and best educated youths all these years. This was a tremendous loss of human assets and capability.

Now we have the opportunity to reverse that trend. Instead, we put a kind of embargo on students from surrounding states with high tuition.

The decision to raise out of state tuition was made following what I took to be a very casual remark by two legislators. There had been no committees or floor discussion of this subject. The views expressed by these legislators was that Idaho taxpayers paid more than their fair share when out of state students came to Idaho. The fact is that Idaho should be interested in bright, educated people to grow roots in Idaho, take important jobs and start new businesses based on our resources and technology.

When students go to school in another state, they often stay. They make friends, get jobs or marry.

We have a regional responsibility. Our students go to other states for medical, dental and other professional training. Are we keeping students from our mining, forestry and other schools with too high out of state tuition?

Recruiting out of state students is provident for the state of Idaho in my view.

ICA initiative harmful to UI

Thanks to the Argonaut for recently drawing attention to Proposition One. Students, staff and faculty of the University of Idaho have good reason to oppose this proposition, as it would deny us freedom of association and expression, limit library access and acquisitions, and eliminate many course offerings; for example, virtually all the anthologies currently used in literature surveys would be banned, for they contain "homosexual" writings by authors ranging from Sappho to Shakespeare, from Walt Whitman to Adrienne Rich.

Furthermore, Proposition One would result in the firing of qualified faculty and staff, and make it difficult to attract to the university students and employees who want to study and work in a community of tolerance and good will.

Judging by the September 13 Argonaut, ICA's John Slack and Congressional candidate Helen Chenoweth favor Proposition One because they are against people having "special rights" on the basis of a "behavioral practice." Catholics, Mormons, Evangelicals, hunters, homosexuals, heterosexuals, fraternity brothers, professors—you name it, what group of people does not have a "behavioral practice" that might rub another group of people the wrong way? Should this bring governmental interference and discrimination? And as for "special rights," the right at issue here is the constitutional one of equal protection under the law. Yes, this has been and must continue to be a right very special to Americans. Defend it by voting against Proposition One.

Columnist off on computers

"I decided, since we just upgraded Windows from 5.0 to 6.2, that I wanted an icon for it." No wonder Brandon has such a difficult time with computers...he has no idea what he is doing!

Interesting statement. Is Brandon on some secret Microsoft Windows development team that is working covertly at the UI? And does Bill Gates know about it? Or is he just attempting to sound computer knowledgeable for his article?

Hey everyone, Windows 6.2 is out! Microsoft skipped Windows 4.xx through 6.1x and jumped straight to 6.2! Wait a minute, Neal...I think he was talking about MS-DOS. Oh.

"I know what computers can do." Are you sure, Brandon?

Three cheers for comet

Yet again, it looks like comets have made the news. First, it was Shoemaker-Levy 9, the high-speed cosmic ice tray (or dirty snowballs, with apologies to Hoyle) that turned Jupiter into a gas giant punching bag a few months ago. Now, it's Macholz-2, a newly discovered comet that has fragmented and is hurtling toward the sun.

Observatories have stated that on its present course, Earth is in no danger of a sudden impact. Some scientists, however, say that it is difficult to accurately predict just where the fragments will end up, since outgassing and the angle of deflection created by the breakup are hard to detect or predict.

In the long run, nobody should lose any sleep over the chances of Macholz-2 landing in your backyard and truly ruining your existence.

Still, in a way, it should serve as food for thought. Here's today's mental experiment: What would happen if a dirty snowball were to collide with this wonderful planet of ours?

Naturally, it would depend on the size. If it was, say, a quarter mile in diameter, I think it's safe to say that everyone could put their head between their legs and kiss their collective asses goodbye. What the sonic boom of atmospheric entry didn't flatten, the subsequent rupture of Earth's crust would. I imagine it would be a hell of a ride. Then, all the dust and particulate matter in the air would probably subject what was left of Earth to something much like Sagan's "nuclear winter." Charming—pack your fur coats.

A smaller chunk would surely destroy a bunch of people and their property, but not seriously damage everyone on the planet. We as a people could survive a smaller strike. Larry Niven and Jerry Pournelle wrote an interesting novel around this scenario called Lucifer's Hammer.

So, it occurs to me that if we ever do get in the way of an extrasolar snowball, it better be a big one. This race is messed up now; if we had to rebuild after a catastrophe like that, it could be something truly grisly that takes the place of civilization.

Imagine; we could find ourselves living a civilization based on game shows. I can just see it now: the leaders of the international powers 100 years after the strike, playing Wheel of Fortune to resolve some problems. Or better yet, Jeopardy. "It's our Daily Double, General. How much will you wager?" "Poland."

Considering the general bent of people in power here in America, we could end up with a theocracy that would make Torquemada look liberal. Or how about a technocracy, where science is elevated to a religion? That would make the UI School of Engineering happy; I bet they have a contingency plan for it. If not, they should.

I'm sure some idealist would argue that it's possible that a better society would rise from the crater. Hey, write in and convince me. I'd sure like to believe it. Until then, I'll continue to hope that if a visitor from the Oort cloud ever decides to stop in, it'll be the biggest ice cube on the block.

Keep your eyes to the skies.

Vandal dancer selection faulty

Many people probably didn't even know or care that there was dance team tryouts this past week. Maybe we should care somewhat; after all, when a group of girls wearing black and gold and bearing the Vandal label perform at our football and basketball games, they are representing the University of Idaho. So what's the problem?

The way the girls are chosen to be on the team, that's the problem. The best girl of all the dancers at practice later didn't try out. Why wouldn't she? Because she was a better dancer than the coaches, she also recognized that the coaches showed little ability. So, how are these coaches picked out? Nobody knows.

OK, so how are the dancers picked? Well, they learn a routine for several days and then perform it in front of judges. Who picks the judges? The coaches, it seems, and from the looks of things, they were friends of the coaches (all three women, incidentally). Did anyone question this? Yes, many of the dancers did, but if you spoke up, your chances of making the team would be zero.

With all else aside, let's talk about the judging. I think for the most part, they did a pretty good job. The six best girls made the team. Three others also made the team, while six were cut. Believe me when I say that the other three that made it should have been switched with the three best that didn't. Now who am I to judge? It doesn't matter, because a baboon could have made that call.

Was all of the judging fair? Maybe and maybe not! After the judges made their initial evaluation, they requested that all of the girls do their tryout routines again, this time in groups of four instead of two. Their excuse was that they couldn't evaluate two girls at once. So is judging groups of four easier? I didn't think so. Most of the girls were very distraught to hear this, because they had been sitting since their performance was over and their muscles were cold. The judges, once more, retired to the locker room to make their final decisions. Sounds good, right?

Well, the coaches also went to the locker room to discuss who had made it or not. If you ask the coaches if they were talking with the judges about the final picks, I'll bet they'll say, "No!"

Well, what were they talking about with the judges? Girl talk, maybe? If that's the case, what an improper time! Three or four minutes before the judges emerged, one of the coaches ran out to retrieve evaluations that had been left behind.

I wonder if the girls whose evaluations got left behind got the same consideration as the rest or if the judges had already formed their opinions based on the evaluations in hand? The reason I say this is after they received the late evaluations, they didn't take long to make a decision. I question the ability of the coaches, since the first year they couldn't hold a team together, and the second year, they couldn't even make a team! I wonder, will anybody care or investigate? I encourage the girls who might feel the same way, to also write a letter.

-Frank LaMacchia

MosCon brings out sci-fi buffs

Helen W. Hill
Contributing Writer

One man in the audience wore a dark, peaked hat speckled with silver moons, a hooded navy robe scattered with golden stars, and long wisps of gray-white hair. Behind him, a purple jewel shone in the turban of a woman who might have stepped from the pages of the Arabian Nights. In front of him sat a ten year old girl in a white and black tiger stripe cavewoman dress.

Did Halloween come early to the Palouse? No, but MosCon's traditional Saturday Masquerade, a costume and skit competition, always including audience participation, did. Some members of the audience rival the contestants and most of them heckled Steve Fahnestalk, MosCon mainstay and master of ceremonies.

All six children in the competition received a prize. The youngest, three year old Ethan Nilsson as Calvin and his four year old cousin Kalya Nilsson as Hobbes, won for the most realistic portrayal; both of Ethan's parents are UI alumni. The child entrants also included King Arthur, Captain Hook, a huge lizard and a young medieval lady.

Humor played a key part in most entrants, but the historical accuracy and craftsmanship was impressive.

At the art auction Sunday afternoon, beautiful pieces went for a song. Some art did not receive the multiple bids necessary to send it to auction and sold for as little as one dollar. "This is a collector's dream," said Priscilla of Firewolf, a crafter who makes and sells crystal jewelry and leather items and declined to give her last name.

The best and hottest often sold for as much as fifty dollars, but seldom approached a hundred, even for original oils and acrylics.

All the guests were open and approachable. Roger Zelazny signed paperbacks, hardbacks, program books and T-shirts. When asked where he got his humor, he said, "I've heard people find humor in what bothers them most." He then told a story about the rationing in World War II France. The grandfather in the story "couldn't do much about it, so he made a joke."

For those interested in science fiction and gaming, Moscow has four groups which meet weekly.

Palouse Adventures meet Monday evenings in the Student Union from 6 to 10:30 for role-playing games. Contact Buell Richardson, president, or members Steve and Jeremy at 882-5762 for information.

Tuesday nights at 7 the UI Science Fiction, Fantasy and Horror Club meets in the Student Union for discussion. Contact Jill Foster, president, at 882-5762, or just show up. "We're usually in the Pow Wow room, but they can check the monitor or at the information desk," said Foster.

Richardson is also president of Professional Simulators of Idaho which has met in the Student Union for more than six years to play strategic games. They meet Friday evenings from 7 to 10:30.

The fourth group is MosCon's parent organization, the twenty year old Palouse Empire Science Fiction Association or PESFA. PESFA meets every Thursday except Thanksgiving at "8-ish" in various locations around Moscow and Pullman. Contact Donna at 332-1271 or Jon at 882-3672 for information.

Health Center offers tobacco classes

Christine Ermev
Contributing Writer

Kevin used chewing tobacco for many years. Although he worried about getting lip cancer, he was unable to quit. Then, one night, in a $20 hotel room in North Dakota, he looked at the inside of his mouth in the mirror and saw what he thought was the beginning of lip cancer. "I was convinced that I had taken it too far," he said. "I was always scared of getting lip cancer, but the doctors here told me that I had quit soon enough."

Kevin is a graduate of the University of Idaho Student Health Services Quit Tobacco group sessions.

"We implemented this program last year, and it is unique to any other quit tobacco program," said Mary Schwantes of the SHS. "For $20, patients get medical assistance, work with an image counselor, and work with me on weight management. It's the best $20 you'll ever spend if you really want to quit."

The Quit Tobacco program is open to all University of Idaho students, faculty and staff. "I even opened it up to faculty spouses and a Washington State University Professor," said Schwantes.

Now, Kevin's clothes smell better, and he has his lungs back. "When I decided to see a doctor, it was a turning point for me. I was making a commitment to quit, and setting aside time to quit," he said.

Kevin first began using tobacco when he had a job cleaning pig stalls. "It kinda numbed my nose and I liked what it did to my head," he said. "Then I started associating tobacco and unpleasant tasks. Then it became the thing to do."

Jennifer, a Quit Tobacco patient, began smoking right after high school. "I moved out of my parent's house a year early. I got a mohawk, started smoking and began wearing a lot of black. It was basically an 'I don't care' attitude," she said. "I find that I also tend to smoke when I feel I have too many people telling me what to do."

Kevin said, "A lot of people smoke when they're stressed, and they tell themselves that they'll quit next month. But it doesn't work that way because next month something else will always come up."

Kevin said that when he began to quit that he really missed the whole role he used to play as a smoker. "I knew it wasn't good for me, and I wanted to live out an 'I don't care' attitude too. Tobacco was an outward presentation of how I felt," he said.

Like many people trying to quit smoking, Jennifer fears the physical withdrawals from nicotine. "I've quit before, and I couldn't think straight," she said.

Kevin, who used to use coffee and tobacco, said that the diet the program uses is very important. "I used to chew tobacco and drink coffee when I was studying. But after I started on the diet, I didn't really need them anymore because I was so wired on fruit juice."

Unlike many smokers trying to quit, Kevin said that he didn't feel the craving for nicotine very badly. "I thought that the craving would be a lot worse," he confessed. "I found the physical withdrawals to be worse. It was harder to find something else to do."

Economics also played a part in Kevin's desire to quit. "Last summer I was living in Washington State, where a can of chew is $3. I figured out that I was paying $1080 a year to poison myself."

Kevin, who quit tobacco with his girlfriend, has been smoke free for almost eight months now. "I found it better to quit with someone because it meant that we weren't seeing it all the time. On the 25th of every month, Kevin and his girlfriend can be found in the no smoking section of a restaurant in Moscow celebrating one more month "on the wagon."

"I saw an immediate change in my lung capacity," said Kevin. "It was amazing."

Kevin said that it would be nice if he were the type of person who could have just one cigarette. "That wouldn't work for me," he said. "Because then I would have to have two and have to have three, et cetera."

"You should never let yourself believe that you can have just one," said Schwantes.

The quit tobacco program begins today and continues every Tuesday and Thursday from 2:30 to 3:30 in the Student Health Services Conference Room until Oct. 25. Those interested should call 885-6693 to make reservations.

Students' papers comprise book

Shelby Beck
Staff Writer

"The federal government can use deficit spending as a way of buying political goodwill, whereas state and local governments cannot," says Landon Curry, an UI associate professor of Political Science.

That, Curry says, is the basis of two books he is writing this semester.

Curry's first book, "Dimensions of State and Local Politics" will be a general textbook published by West Publishing, Inc.

His second project, a textbook specific to Idaho state and local politics, will be written in part by students of Curry's American State and Local Government class.

The object, according to Curry, is to stimulate more meaningful writing from students and is done in conjunction with a program called Writing Across Curriculum.

"Students tend to write papers for grades rather than for broader purposes," Curry says. "Often they do nothing akin to the real world."

He says with this project, students might feel a broader sense of responsibility to produce better work if they know a large audience will read it.

"This will be a much more interactive process than a student usually gets," Curry says.

Curry set up the project to teach students about the writing process through a system of feedback and criticism within each group.

““ Students tend to write papers for grades rather than for broader purposes, often they do nothing akin to the real world.

between the groups and Curry and with the UI writing lab.

In producing the project, student groups take the general structure of state and local political systems and research Idaho issues.

Each group will write a separate chapter looking first at the fiscal dimensions of state government and then at present reform issues.

"It allows you to examine current issues. It allows you to analyze problems of the present system and it gives you the opportunity to address possible outcomes if that system is changed," Curry says.

Because the book is not yet under contract with a major publishing house, Curry is entertaining a number of possibilities for the end result.

While he plans to have the project published as a book suitable for college students or the general public, Curry says it could possibly turn into a smaller supplement for high school government students.

Curry's book, "Dimensions of State and Local Politics," is due out this April.

French Film Festival Presents 'Cyrano de Bergerac'

Amy Ridenour
Lifestyles Editor

The classic tale of "Cyrano de Bergerac" comes to the Student Union Borah Theater Sept. 24. "Cyrano" is probably the biggest French language film to come to the United States in years.

Gerard Depardieu, one of the greatest actors in the world today, portrays Cyrano in the film. His performance has been hailed as "a masterly, definitive performance as the man with the soul of a poet and the schnozz the size of a small car." Depardieu was the winner of "Best Actor" in 1990 at the Cannes Film Festival.

"Cyrano" was awarded "Best Foreign Film" from the National Board of Review, and was a Golden Globe Nominee. Directed by Jean-Paul Rappeneau, "Cyrano" lasts for 138 minutes and is rated PG. "Cyrano" is scheduled to play at 7 and 9:30 p.m. in the Borah Theater and comes complete with subtitles for those not fluent in the language of love.

"Rhapsody in August," part of the International Film Festival, will be shown September 21 at 7 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom. "Rhapsody" is about the Nuclear Holocaust in Nagasaki and is a powerful presentation of the Second World War and the Holocaust.

The film takes the viewer to Nagasaki, where four cousins visit their grandmother, a survivor of the Holocaust.

What appears to be a distant and incomprehensible event to the cousins becomes clear when a visitor arrives to apologize and pay respects. The film has English subtitles.

Admission for both films is $1 UI undergraduate, $2 general admission.

Pavement emerges into music world

Matt Baldwin
Contributing Writer

Music in today's world is a very tumultuous thing. The industry moves and swirls like a storm over the coast. Within that cloud of streaked gray colors and yellow flashes, it is hard to differ what is happening in that storm.

Yet, when you watch closely, something emerges out of that storm that lasts on the retina of the eye.

Burning in, leaving a stain that cannot be forgotten, the industry has pumped out another great band, "Pavement."

Not newborn to the music world, Pavement is slowly climbing their way into the spotlight. Constantly striving to capture the lightning that other bands have achieved, with their new album, "Crooked Rain, Crooked Rain," they have finally broken through.

The album possesses a rare mood that only Pavement could undertake. The lyrics mingle with the unreal as they sing "Stop Breathin'," and bring you into a mood of ethereal peace, a peace hymned by their vocalist's non-brackish voice.

With song's such as "Stop Breathin'" and "Cut Your Hair," Pavement is sure to go all the way with this record. A very definite must-have addition to any alternative CD collection.

The music on the CD flies over the spectrum of musical talent. Some songs are soft, some are hard, and one never knows with Pavement.

Pavement's "Crooked Rain, Crooked Rain" is available on Matador records and can be acquired at most record stores.

UI to Celebrate Bell Day

Amy Ridenour
Lifestyles Editor

Governor Cecil D. Andrus has declared, Sept. 23, as "Thomas O. Bell Day." The Moscow community, along with UI, will pay a tribute to Bell, who will retire from the University on Oct. 1. Bell, who spent 40 years in education, 25 of those years at UI, stepped down as provost July 1. Bell has had a stellar career as an educator in the state of Idaho and has provided great service to UI.

Bell's service to UI began in 1966 in the UI Bureau of Education Research and worked for three years as an associate dean. In 1969, Bell left the university but returned in 1980 and was named dean of the College of Education. He became the Vice President for Academic Affairs and Research in 1984, which was retitled Provost in 1991.

Bell helped bring in $12.5 million in external funding, and in 1994 with his continuing support, the external research funding will exceed $50 million.

With Vice Provost Jeanne Shreeve, Bell helped to develop five research institutes, including biotechnology water resources, microelectronics, advanced materials processing and aquaculture. In addition, Bell helped the College of Business and Economics obtain accreditation.

Bell was a supporter of establishing core curriculum. He also helped with the Lionel Hampton Jazz Festivals, the Idaho Repertoire Theater and the chamber music series.

President Elisabeth Zinser has said, "Dr. Bell's 25 years of service to this university spans one quarter of its history, and we can attribute to his leadership the high quality, superb character and growing reputation it enjoys. His achievements cannot be overstated. His service to Idaho as a senior educational statesman places him among the most distinguished of Idahoans, and his influence has been felt nationally and internationally as well. Within the higher education community, Dr. Bell is respected as an academic statesman of the first order."

The week long tribute begins Sept. 20 with a presentation of the governor's proclamation of "Thomas O. Bell Day" at 11:30 a.m. in front of the Administration Building.

Also on Tuesday, Susan Billin of the Lionel Hampton School of Music will perform a selection of classical compositions from noon to 12:30 p.m. in honor of Dr. Bell's service to Idaho education.

Wednesday, Sept. 21, in the Student Union Borah Theater, Ivan Doig will give a lecture entitled "The American West as Heart Earth," from 11:30 to 2:30 p.m. A question and answer period will follow the lecture and a book signing is planned at the UI Bookstore.

On Sept. 23, Dr. Shirley

Malcolm will meet with students from 9 to 10 a.m. at the College of Education Building Instructional Materials Center.

Malcolm will also give a public lecture on diversity from 10:30 to 11:20 a.m. in Room 10 of the College of Forestry, Wildlife and Range Sciences. There will be education and technology displays from 1:15 to 2:15 p.m. at the Student Union Ballroom. From 2:30 to 3:30 p.m., Malcolm will offer a presentation on "Diversity and Educational Equity" in Room 6 of the Niccolis.

On Saturday at the Vandal football game halftime; Arturo Sandoval will play a trumpet salute to Dr. Bell.

Bell has said, "I will leave with many, many fond memories. This is a wonderful place and an outstanding university. I know the people of Idaho have a great amount of pride in the University of Idaho.

I have served with an incredibly talented faculty, staff and administration. I consider it an honor for a kid from Inkom, Idaho, to conclude his academic career as provost of the University of Idaho."

Hisaw, in his first real test at quarterback, guided the Vandals to a 48-38 win over the University of Nevada-Las Vegas. He completed 17-of-28 passes for 284 yards, five touchdown passes, and 122 yards rushing.

Mindy Rice, 6-foot-3 senior outside hitter from Grandview, Idaho.

Rice was named the Most Valuable Player at the Cal Poly Invitational in San Luis Obispo, Calif. She averaged 6.6 kills per game and hit .454 for the tournament. Rice had at least 21 kills in each of the Vandals' four matches and finished with 93 for the tournament.

Hisaw super in victory at Vegas

Andrew Longeteig
Sports Editor

With the departure of John Friesz in 1989, Vandal football fans were left in turmoil to find a replacement. Then came Doug Nussmeier. Now that Nussmeier is gone — how will Idaho replace him?

The answer was found Saturday as the Vandals (2-0) upended the University of Nevada-Las Vegas 48-38, due largely in part to the performance of Eric Hisaw.

The junior quarterback ran, passed, directed — did seemingly everything except buy Head Coach John L. Smith a cigar after the win.

Hisaw completed 17-of-29 passes for 284 yards and threw for a career-high five touchdowns. Additionally, Hisaw ran for 122 yards.

In comparison, UNLV (1-2) ran for minus 21 yards.

The passing game for the Runnin' Rebels, however, amassed 635 yards which wasn't surprising since they threw the ball 79 times.

Both teams combined for 1,321 yards of total offense.

The loss negated an astounding performance by UNLV wide receiver Randy Gatewood. He shredded the Vandal secondary with an NCAA record 23 catches for 363 yards. Gatewood caught 13 passes in the fourth quarter alone.

His partner in crime, Henry Bailey, caught nine passes for 159 yards and scored four touchdowns. "For the most part, we played three quarters of great football," Smith said.

The Vandals jumped out to a 31-10 lead in the first half. Idaho used a balanced attack with running backs Joel Thomas and Sherriden May, and the passing of Hisaw.

For the game, the Vandals ran for 423 yards, the most for an Idaho team since 1981.

After three quarters, UNLV was down 45-10, but still had a gasp of life remaining.

The Runnin' Rebels scored three unanswered touchdowns, all on passes by reserve quarterback Jason Davis.

"We thought the nail was in the coffin, and we did some things we maybe shouldn't have," Smith said.

The "hogs" of the Vandals listen to Art Valero's wise words. The offensive line was instrumental in Saturday's 48-38 victory over UNLV. Thanks to them, Idaho's running game produced 423 yards — the highest output since 1981. The win was the third straight over a Division I-A opponent.

Bart Stageberg

UNLV was down by two touchdowns and in Vandal territory when linebacker Duke Garrett nullified the drive with an interception.

Garrett, along with cornerback Arnold Gunn, led the Vandals with nine tackles.

After trading possessions, Idaho punter Eddie Howard received a high snap and avoided a blocked kick as he scrambled 46 yards for a first down to ice the game — for good, this time.

On a sour note, starting Vandal linebacker Jason Shelt will be lost for the season with a knee injury. He will, however, retain his junior status for next season.

Shelt's backup is Josh Fetter, who started as a freshman, but ironically lost his job to Shelt when he went down with an injury two years ago.

"It (the UNLV comeback) will teach us as players, it will teach us as coaches, and we're going to all learn from this and get better," Smith said.

The Vandals will play at home for the first time this year, as they meet nationally ranked Stephen F. Austin in the Kibbie Dome Saturday at 1:05 p.m.

SAN LUIS OBISPO, Calif.— The Idaho Vandals took the fight out of the Virginia Cavaliers with a 15-4, 15-8, 15-5 drubbing of the Atlantic Coast Conference school, claiming the championship of the Cal-Poly Invitational Saturday in NCAA volleyball action.

The win continues Idaho's best start in school history, improving the club's record to 11-1, the lone loss coming at the hands of the Big Ten's nationally ranked Wisconsin Badgers.

Idaho knocked off the host Cal-Poly SLO Mustangs as well, 12-15, 15-7, 15-10, 15-3. The other Vandal victim in the tourney was 21st-ranked University of San Diego 17-15, 15-2, 15-12.

Idaho's Mindy Rice turned in a stellar tournament performance en route to earning tourney MVP honors. The senior standout averaged 6.6 kills per game and a .454 hitting percentage in the two-day set.

Rice had at least 21 kills in each of the Vandal victories and totaled 93 kills in four matches last week.

Tzvetelina Yanchulova was named to the all-tourney team as well after pounding 72 kills in the four matches. Yanchulova has been named to the all-tournament team in all three tourneys the Vandals have participated this season.

In addition, the Bulgarian sensation leads all NCAA Division I players in kills per game with a 6.2 average.

Against the Cavaliers Idaho's defense was unforgiving, allowing Virginia just a .016 attack average with 28 errors and 30 kills. The Vandals on the other hand committed only nine errors in 104 swings and finished the match hitting .375.

The Toreros did not fare much better, hitting .143 compared to .336 for the Vandals. The statistic is surprising considering the Vandals had only 16 digs while San Diego doubled that output with 32.

Idaho was outblocked 9-8 by the Toreros but did in the California school by collecting 54 kills while San Diego could manage only 35.

Despite a first game loss to Cal-Poly the Vandals dominated nearly every category on the stat sheet. The Vandals outthit the Mustangs .356 to .160, outkilled the Mustangs 73-52 and saved 61 balls on digs compared to Cal-Poly's 50.

Idaho's triumphs hurled Head Coach Tom Hilbert over the century mark in career wins with 101. Hilbert is only the second Vandal coach and fifth Big Sky head coach to surpass the milestone.

UI soccer club finishes second in round robin tourney

UI soccer club member Jason Transtrum defends a WSU player in Sunday's tournament which also featured a team from the Muslim Student Association. The UI soccer club took second place, losing to WSU 5-2, and defeating MSA 1-0 at Guy Wicks Field.

Matt Shifley Staff Writer

The University of Idaho Soccer Club team hosted a round-robin tournament on Sunday afternoon that included teams from Washington State and the Muslim Student Association.

The Idaho club team, for the second time in as many weeks, could not defeat the WSU "World" team, losing 5-2.

However, they came back strong in their second game and defeated the MSA team 1-0 to take home a second-place finish.

Idaho got goals from Jayson Transtrum and Downen Raynor in their loss to WSU and the lone goal in their victory over MSA came off a header from Raynor.

Ron McFarland, a member of the Idaho team, said up until about two years ago they used to consistently beat the WSU team, but now the tables have turned.

"WSU just has an awful lot of team speed and quickness, and I think they play better together than we do even though we play better together than we use to," said McFarland.

"Right now they are playing better as team, they drop off a pass or if someone gets in trouble there's always someone else there, they have good depth and attack."

McFarland mentioned the team did rebound well against MSA showing poise and composure in a game that was a defensive struggle throughout.

The goal that secured Idaho's win was off of a corner kick directed into the net by a header.

Jeff Huang recorded the shut-out for Idaho in goal, and the team received excellent midfield play from Adam Lewis.

Sweeper Dave Davis was commended from McFarland for his consistent defensive work.

McFarland also had high praise for the MSA team because they played Idaho tough after getting ripped by WSU 9-1.

He said the whole team was surprised by how much determination they showed.

Idaho's record falls to 1-2 for the fall season and anyone interested can catch the team in action next Sunday at 3 p.m. at Guy Wicks Field.

The UI soccer club's opponent will be the Latin American team who is sponsored by the restaurant Casa de Oro.
