ASUI candidates sling mud

Presidential race marked by round of bugging and back stabbing

Adam Gardels

In the race for the ASUI presidential position, some candidates have neglected ethics, opting instead to discuss the possibility of eavesdropping on political enemies with electronic devices.

ASUI Senator Sean Wilson has been implicated in conspiring to plant a device on a woman who was going to meet with presidential candidate Cade King. Crista Manis, an ASUI senatorial candidate involved in both Wilson's and King's campaigns, said Wilson asked her to wear a microphone in a meeting with King.

Manis said she was having a phone conversation with Wilson on Sept. 23 when she told him she was going to discuss campaign ideas with King. Manis said Wilson asked her if she would "feel comfortable in wearing a wireless microphone."

Wilson said, "I never intended to go through with it, and I didn't go through with it. This has been completely blown out of proportion."

"At first I thought he was kidding," Manis

UI biodiesel research recognized nationally

Zachary Craig-Works

Imagine driving your brand new pickup truck almost 9,000 miles around the country without ever filling up with fuel. Now imagine that the fuel you fill the tank with is biodegradable, safer and cleaner burning than conventional diesel and can be grown right here on the Palouse.

That is exactly what UI agricultural engineering professor Charles Peterson and his research assistant Daryl Reese did last summer. Peterson and Reese drove their 1994 Dodge pickup from Moscow to Los Angeles, back to Moscow, then east all the way to Washington, D.C. and back west through Milwaukee, Wisconsin to Moscow.

This great feat, along with the fact that the only fuel they used was vegetable oil, has brought the UI Agricultural Engineering Program national attention. Upcoming broadcasts of the television series, "Today's Environment," will highlight the developments in biodiesel made at UI. CNBC will air the show on Nov. 12 at 9 p.m., PST, and can also be seen on the Discovery Channel on Nov. 16 at 7:30 a.m., PST. Peterson, who has been working on biodiesel at UI since 1979, said that this latest publicity is "probably a little different than our recognition in the past." He said he has been featured on talk shows and periodical newspaper articles in the past, but this kind of coverage is different.

It was not any ordinary kitchen vegetable oil that brought Reese and Peterson this recognition. Peterson used ethyl ester of rapeseed oil to fuel his cross-country trip.

Before the oil can be viable, it must undergo a process called esterification. The process involves a forced chemical reaction between an alcohol, like methanol or ethanol, and vegetable oil. The reaction results in a methyl or ethyl very similar to diesel, so the fuel can be burned in a regular diesel engine with little or no modification. Through the process, the properties of the oil that have a negative effect on combustion are altered.

The change of properties makes esterification the best process to date for the improvement of raw oils for alternative fuel. However, the biodiesel is costly to make, and is still too expensive for widespread use. Commercially, biodiesel is sold on a limited basis for about

Women's Center debates Prop. Two

Shelby Dopp
Staff

The University of Idaho Women's Center hosted a debate Tuesday on whether or not term limits should be imposed upon federal and local politicians, known as Proposition Two.

Shirley Greene, a Latah County Commissioner, argued against the proposed initiative mainly because of the wording. "The proposition will only affect elected officials at the local level all the way down to the state board position," she said. She added that this proposition will not effect politicians at the federal level, even though it is mentioned in the initiative's question on the ballot.

She argued that one state cannot change the U.S. Constitution in order to limit federal elected officials.

So voting "yes" on Proposition Two will limit the terms of elected officials at the local level and not at the federal level, where the main problem tends to be present, she said.

Cheryl Holst, region two coordinator for United We Stand America, argued in favor of the term limits proposition. However, she agreed with Greene that the wording of the proposition will not solve the problem at the federal level.

Holst argued that all states need to be in agreement about the term limits issue in order to change the Constitution. Fifteen states have already passed term limit legislation and nine others will vote for similar measures on Nov. 8.

She also referred back to the days when the framers created the Constitution. "They never thought they would serve the country for a lifetime," Holst said.

She noted that it was not until the early 1900s that the United States started seeing career politicians, such as members of the Kennedy and Roosevelt families.

Term limits will provide campaign finance reform, get rid of the seniority clout of long-term incumbents and even shorten the process of getting legislation passed, Holst said.

Besides term limits, the two women also touched on issues such as Political Action

1994 Ballot Information

Larry LaRocco
Incumbent Candidate for U.S. House, District 1 Democrat

Opposed to term limits. Wants to see the government save Idaho's salmon runs. Supports abortion rights. Against assault weapons ban. Opposes Proposition One. Supported Clinton budget plan. Supports ban on replacing striking workers. Wants a health care system with a minimum of bureaucracy. Sees governmental gridlock driven by Republican obstructionists. Supports student loans and an expanded definition of middle class. Advocates a balanced approach to logging in national forests. Wants to establish limits for Welfare and give authority to the states to try programs at the local level. Wants the government to move away from unfunded mandates.

Mike Burkett,
Candidate for Attorney General Democrat

Supported legislation for license suspensions for DUI's. Intends to resolve claim disputes concerning Idaho's water rights with the Federal Government and Native American Tribal Authorities. Interested in resolving such issues as the Salmon Recovery Act without sacrificing Idaho's water rights as a result of draw downs. Advocates "boot camps" for repeat juvenile criminals. Believes in juvenile crime prevention at a young age through school and community activities. Opposes storage of nuclear waste in Idaho that is generated out of state. He does support the INEL continuing to research nuclear waste storage. Supports lawful protest of such activities as abortions but does not believe that the protest should directly interfere with an individual who is actually undergoing an abortion.

Edith Stanger
Candidate for Secretary of State Democrat

Supports Congressman LaRocco's efforts to pass an Idaho wilderness bill. Supports establishing timber sale appeals process on state lands.

J.D. Williams
Incumbent Candidate for State Auditor

Wants to shift auditing duty to the Legislature and change the office. Seeks to balance state Land Board votes.

Larry EchoHawk
Candidate for Governor Democrat

Supports a freeze in hiring of state workers. Also promises to freeze taxes and to cap state budget growth at the rate of private sector growth. Opposed to tribal casino gambling. Proposes tougher penalties for hardened juvenile criminals. Emphasizes state programs to give support to children at an early age. Supports recovery Sockeye and Chinook salmon. Believes in a balance between protecting the environment and sustaining jobs. Opposed to shipments of highly radioactive materials and nuclear fuels into Idaho. Opposed to abortion except in cases of rape, incest, and endangerment to the life of the mother, but opposes laws that breach constitutional principles. Believes strong education is the key to a strong future economy.

John Peavey
Candidate for Lt. Governor Democrat

Led the campaign for Idaho's "Sunshine Law." He believes special interests have locked the general populace out of the governing process. Does not support the storage of additional nuclear waste at the Idaho National Engineering

Pete Cenarrusa
Incumbent Candidate for Secretary of State Republican

Opposes term limits initiative. Supports moving western public land states out of federal oversight. Supports livestock industry on the Land Board.

Helen Chenoweth
Candidate for U.S. House, District 1 Republican

Believes that many environmental regulations are excessive and stifle economic activity. Believes that the proper role of the federal government in environmental issues is as a source of scientific information rather than the source of punitive measures. Believes that all public lands must be managed to minimize devastating fires, and this management includes select cutting of timber. Opposed to the Crime Bill because it primarily consists of social programs that have a dubious relation to crime and it includes non-funded federal mandates. Opposed to gun control. Supports Welfare reform that consists of requiring able bodies welfare recipients to re-enter the work force after a specified period of time. Believes that the federal role in education should be reduced to merely setting standards. Believes in eliminating the federal Department of Education and managing its duties at the state level. Opposed to a national health care plan because she believes it would be inefficient and would resort to rationing of services.

Ron Rankin
Candidate for Governor Independent

Opposes all spending bills until property tax relief and spending limits are enacted. Wants a cost of living cap on all local government budget increases. Supports moving school maintenance costs from property to state income and sales taxes. Supports Proposition One. In favor of term limits. Promises to be in the middle on environmental policies, with an emphasis on the side of protecting jobs. Against abortion rights. Strongly in favor of private property rights.

Willie Sullivan
Candidate for State Superintendent of Schools Democrat

Opposes school vouchers. Supports lowering the 66.5 percent majority requirement for passage of school levies. In favor parental involvement being a qualification for school accreditation. Opposes Proposition One. Advocates performance-based education. Wants to let parents in on the decision making process. Opposes a statewide teacher salary scale. Supports building new facilities to relieve overcrowding.

Allan Lance
Candidate for Attorney General Republican

Intends to support Idaho water rights by evaluating each Federal and Native American claim based on it's right. Opposes draw downs for the practice of "fish-flushing." Believes that Idaho should absorb some nuclear waste resulting from National Defense. Does not support storing nuclear waste generated from nuclear power plants located in other states. Advocates developing a "stand alone" juvenile corrections program as opposed to allowing Health and Welfare to continue to operate juvenile corrections. Advocates building three regional "boot camps" much like the Cottonwood facility. Supports reviewing current felony sentences to ensure that maximum security facilities are prioritized for violent offenders.

Phil Batt
Candidate for Governor Republican

Supports immediate $60 million property tax cut. Opposes Proposition One. Proposes moving treatment of juvenile criminals to Department of Correction. Supports merit pay for teachers. Opposes tribal casino gambling. Supports enhancing the job base. Wants to see less regulation of traditional industries like timber. Believes in keeping fees for higher education as low as possible. Against abortion except in cases of rape, incest, or there is a threat to the life of the mother. Opposes draw downs that take Idaho's water and are not proven to work.

Anne C. Fox
Candidate for State Superintendent of schools Republican

Wants statewide curriculum standards. Traditional educator. Seeks to in-service school boards, principals and superintendents to talk with parents. Supports voucher program. Opposed to outcome-based education. Wants to remove school funding from property taxes. Against anti-gay initiative, but opposes teaching sexual preference or lifestyle in the public schools. Wants to standardize school building construction.

Ralph Gines
Candidate for State Auditor Republican

Wants to increase public access to state financial records. Would use office to speak out against federal land use restrictions on mining and farming.

C.L. "Butch" Otter
Incumbent Candidate for Lt. Governor Republican

Seeks to retain the current economic climate and to strengthen agriculture and non-agriculture business. Wants to provide property tax relief. Promotes a stop in state government growth and seeks to consolidate state programs for efficiency. Wants to stop forced federal regulations. Believes government should promote business without government interference. Emphasizes the importance of decisions made at the local level.

Argonaut Interview

Kempthorne reflects on UI, first year in Senate

Shannon Paterson

Dirk Kempthorne is a University of Idaho alumnus. While he was a student, he served as ASUI President. Kempthorne was mayor of Boise before assuming his role as U.S. Senator for the state of Idaho. He just completed his first session in that office.

Argonaut: You were an ASUI president when you were a student here. How did that help you with what you're doing now, as far as politics?

Kempthorne: I think it gave me opportunities to realize that if you want to get something done you need to work with people, to look for opportunities for consensus instead of conflict, but also to realize that if you want to get something done sometimes you have to just draw a line in the sand and just stand by what you believe in and at times that may not be popular, but I think people will respect that.

Argonaut: How have your experiences as mayor of Boise affected your life in Washington?

Kempthorne: Well, first of all, I've been homesick. It's tough being 2500 miles away from the people you work for and that you like being around, but it's an honor to be representing Idahoans back in Washington. It is different from being a mayor because as mayor I could pick up the phone and if there was a problem I could talk to the specific department heads that would be needed to resolve the problem and by five o'clock we could have something corrected. Back there they talk in terms of years. But I feel good that we've made some progress on some key legislation and I think we're beginning to build credibility back there. And that pays off in that environment.

Argonaut: What kind of progress have you made as far as legislating bills?

Kempthorne: Well, the first bill that I ever introduced was the bill to stop unfunded federal mandates, which when you talk to any school, any school administrator, any university, any mayor or county commissioner, you'll find that so much of the budget of those institutions or communities goes toward paying for federal programs that there's no choice. This bill would stop that practice. As a freshman, I was told, "Well, this legislation won't go anywhere. You're brand new...and this would fundamentally change how government works, so you don't have any chance." Today I can tell you that I now have 66 co-sponsors in the Senate and we have a majority of House members that are co-sponsors of this bill. It has now come out of committee with the unanimous support of all committee members in the Senate; it has come out of the House on a 35 to four vote. So it looks as though it will be one of the first bills to come forward next session. And John Glenn, the chairman of the Government Affairs Committee, has now joined me as my partner in this, so it's called the Kempthorne/Glenn bill and it is bipartisan. The White House has now issued a letter supporting this legislation and the President has spoken specifically about this. We also have put together a coalition, so that we have the nation's mayors, county commissioners, school board administrators and governors all endorsing this legislation.

Argonaut: What would happen

as far as gridlock? Would you work with the President?

Kempthorne: Oh sure. And again, I think that that legislation—the fact that you have 67 senators—there's a number of them that are democrats who are sponsors of my bill. So it demonstrates that it can be done, and that is how it ought to be done.

Argonaut: What about your environmental rider that had to do with diverting water?

Kempthorne: There is a bill that deals with wildlife refuges. The point that I raised—I wish I could give you the specific language—but it stated that the Secretary of Interior would be required to insure the quantity and quality of water for a wildlife refuge. And the problem is, that language can be construed that it would subordinate state water rights to the federal government. Now, I think everybody in Idaho realizes that you have to protect state water rights. So I made it very clear that I could not support that bill and I would do all that I could to stop it, as long as that language was there. This is one of the times you just bow your back. Because of that, Senator Gramm dropped that lan-

I thoroughly enjoyed being a student at the University of Idaho. It helped prepare me for my career both in business and in public life, but I also took some terrific memories away from here. So be proud to be a Vandal.

guage and then put in my language—specific language to guarantee state water rights. That was a significant change. And also, I worked with him to allow us to determine what are compatible uses, so that not all activities, just without any discussion, were removed from those wildlife refuges. That may be what you're referring to.

Argonaut: How do you feel about partisan politics right now?

Kempthorne: I'm proud to be a Republican. And people can have honest differences of opinion but in order for us to get something done, we have to work together. So I think there are a number of occasions that we ought to put partisan politics aside and do what's best for the country and to work on that. I'll tell you, for example, I held in my office a gathering—at my invitation—of all freshmen senators, both Republican and Democrat. We had more than one meeting. That's the only time that they were called together. And my point was, we are the folks that have been most recently elected and we ought to look to those

Researcher to present lecture

Dr. Arthur Grossman, a renowned researcher of the Carnegie Institute for Plant Biology at Stanford, will present two lectures on the necessary "antennae" of organisms today. He will speak at 12:30 p.m. on "Molecular Aspects of Cyanobacterial Acclimation to Nutrient Limitation" in Life Sciences Room 227 and at 4:30 p.m. on "Complementary Chromatic Adaptation: Light Regulated Biosynthesis of the Light Harvesting Complex in Cyanobacteria" in Life Sciences Room 163. Both lectures are open to the public.

Agency to help with heat bills

The Community Action Agency is accepting applications from low income families who need help paying their winter heating bills. Eligibility is based on income level, number in the household and the fuel supplier. The program will run through March 31.

Phys. Therapy session offered

Dr. Alexander Urfer, Department Chair of Physical Therapy at Idaho State University, will be in room 341 of the Life Sciences Building on Nov. 17 to discuss the physical therapy program at ISU. All interested students are encouraged to attend.

Pancake feed to raise funds

Professors from the College of Forestry, Wildlife and Range will be cooking pancakes tomorrow from 7:30 a.m. to 10:30 a.m. to raise money for the Students Affairs Council. The all-you-can-eat breakfast will be held at St. Augustine Church at a cost of $3 for adults and students, $2 for children 12 and under and free for children under 6. Tickets can be purchased at the door or in the CFWR Dean's Office.

Forum slated for re-broadcast

KUOI-FM will re-broadcast the community forum on Proposition One which was held on Oct. 20 at the Moscow Community Center. It will be aired Sunday at 7 p.m. on 89.3 FM in the Moscow area or 93.3 FM in Moscow and outlying areas. The forum features Pastor Doug Wilson and Attorney Greg Dickinson arguing in favor of Proposition One and Pastor Lynn Ungar and Barbara Greever of the Idaho Library Association arguing against the measure.

Video premieres today

"Out in the Middle of Nowhere", a video featuring gay and lesbian residents of the Palouse, will premiere on channel 17 today at 6:30 p.m. and will be re-broadcast Monday at 9 p.m. The video was written, filmed and scored by Jeff Olson, the video production specialist for University Communications.

Republicans to meet tomorrow

The University of Idaho College Republicans will meet tomorrow at the Latah County Republican Headquarters at 10 a.m. The headquarters are located at the old Moscow Mall near Safeway. For more information, call Justin at 885-6504.

Latin dancers to hold class

The Macarena, a Latin American line dance, will be taught today at 4:30 in the Appaloosa ballroom of the Student Union Building. The dance session will be taught by natives of Latin America and is sponsored by the Students' International Association. Food will also be available.

Microscopist to present findings

Internationally recognized chemical microscopist Dr. Walter McCrone will give a lecture titled, "The Shroud of Turin" on Nov. 8 at 7:30 p.m. in room 217A of the Compton Union Building at Washington State University.

News Briefs

The Shroud of Turin is a 14-foot length of linen cloth which some scholars believe to be the Shroud of Christ. McCrone has examined the cloth and will present his own findings.

Scholarships available

The U.S. Channel of Commerce for Higher Education has compiled a list of private sector scholarships that are available to college students. Some offer money to students who are left-handed, members of a church or "C" students and many pay full tuition. For more information, send a self-addressed, stamped, number 10 envelope to the U.S. Channel for Higher Education, College Bound, P.O. Box 773, O'Fallon, IL, 62269.

Computer info session offered

Dr. David Van Over and Dr. Len Jessup will speak on effective group support systems, which are computer-based information systems used to support collaborative group work. The meeting will be held on Nov. 16 from 12:30 to 1:20 in the Silver and Gold Rooms of the Student Union Building. For more information, contact Suzanne Loker at 885-6546 or Pam Farmer at 885-6609.

areas that we can work together and establish clearly that we have a different attitude. And that is, "Let's get the job done."

Argonaut: What are your feelings about the Clinton Health Care Bill?

Kemphorne: Well, the Clinton Health Care Bill is dead. In fact, when they began that bus tour around the country, the morning that that started—when Hillary Clinton was beginning the bus trip—Democratic leadership met with the President in his office and told him his bill was dead. The American public spoke out. Now, while I disagree with the President's proposal, I applaud him for bringing the health care debate front-and-center. It should be front-and-center, and he did that. If you were to lay all these different job proposals out on the table, you'd find that they all had a common element to them. For example, portability, so that you could take your insurance with you from job to job; doing away with pre-existing conditions so that you're not plagued, for the rest of your life if you happen to have a condition that's very serious. Anti-trust reforms, so that you can allow hospitals like Gritman to talk with a hospital in Pullman and find out, "Are there ways we can avoid duplicating services and bring about savings to our people?" Malpractice reform, court reform, incentives for rural health care—those items we can all agree on. And in fact, I wrote a bill that has been introduced—I'll re-introduce it next session—that covers all those, including 100 percent tax deduction towards the small operators, like the loggers, ranchers so they get the samesort of tax deduction as major corporations. We ought to pass that. I wish we would have passed this session. I don't care whose name is on it, because that would have begun significant reform. But I reject national health care. I don't want a government-run health care program. But these steps would allow us to have significant change that would be very productive and I think it would be welcomed by the American public.

Argonaut: Do you have any advice for UI students, considering that you were a University of Idaho student yourself?

Kemphorne: Sure. Realize that they are attending a terrific school, it's a great school. I received a great education here. So apply yourself so that you benefit from that education. I mean, make sure that you devote the time necessary, but while doing that, realize that these will be the best days of your life. And enjoy it here. I thoroughly enjoyed being a student at the University of Idaho. It helped prepare me for my career both in business and in public life, but I also took some terrific memories away from here. So be proud to be a Vandal.

Forum discusses HJR 16

Zachary Craig-Works

Staff

In an informal forum Wednesday at the University of Idaho Women's Center Lounge, Moscow attorney Craig Mosman and UI Law Professor Elizabeth Brandt discussed HJR 16.

HJR 16, the victim's rights amendment to the Idaho State Constitution, comes up for a vote on Nov. 8. If passed, it would amend Article I, Section 22 of the Idaho State Constitution.

Some of the rights included in HJR 16 are the right of victims to be treated with fairness, respect, dignity and privacy in the criminal justice process, the right to be present at all criminal justice proceedings, the right to a timely disposition of the case with which they are involved, and the right to be heard at all criminal justice proceedings considering a plea of guilty, sentencing, incarceration or release of the defendant.

The discussion on the proposed amendment started at 12:30 p.m.

and ran for almost an hour. It began with Mosman making the pro-HJR 16 stand. Mosman, a former Latah county prosecutor, said that this was an amendment that provided fair treatment for victims of crimes.

"It provides (that) victims of crime be treated with dignity and respect," Mosman said.

He expressed concern about the lack of involvement of victims of crime in the actual case. Mosman said that the amendment would provide "something as basic as the right to communicate with the prosecutor."

Mosman said that he believed this amendment was needed in the constitution because it would make victim's rights basic and fundamental to all.

To back up his argument, Mosman made the point that a victim of a crime as of now does not have the right to be heard at a hearing involving their case. "This constitutional amendment provides them (victims) with the dignity and respect they deserve," Mosman said.

Brandt, former President of the Idaho ACLU, spoke after Mosman and took a stance against HJR 16, but said she agreed with much of what Mosman said. Brandt expressed mainly technical and legal concerns over the amendment, not actual theoretical concerns.

Brandt outlined major problems that she, and the ACLU, had with the amendment. Her first concern was HJR 16 was not a typical amendment. She said that it was different in form than any of the other amendments in the State Constitution. Brandt said, "This is an odd provision."

Her second concern was that the amendment does not clearly lay out how it will be interpreted. Brandt said that the ACLU tried to amend it while it was still being considered by Idaho legislators, but their efforts failed.

Brandt said that the amendment could threaten the defendant's right to a defense and a fair trial. She said. Wilson asked her where they were planning to meet, and Manis told him the meeting would take place in the Student Union.

Manis realized Wilson was no longer joking when he began discussing details. She said Wilson wanted her to meet King in the Vandal Cafe so Wilson could be close enough to receive the low frequency signals from the microphone he wanted her to wear. Manis said Wilson told her, "You could wear it in your jacket." Manis refused to wear the microphone.

Manis said she was shocked and said, "You know, Sean, it's student government. Why would you want to do this?"

According to Manis, Wilson replied, "Because I want to win this (election)."

She said Wilson called back a second time and apologized, saying, "You were right; I was wrong."

Manis said, "He showed remorse for thinking such a thing."

Wilson believes Manis was a "double agent." He said she used to be his campaign advisor, but "it's no secret she campaigns with my opponent." After learning Manis had revealed the wire story to others, Wilson had a conversation with Manis and said he learned her true intentions. According to Wilson, "She basically said, 'It's your word against mine and I'm going to win.'"

Manis believes Wilson was temporarily consumed by a lust for winning and the cost of the campaign. "This campaign is his baby," she said.

Manis also commented on the incredible cost of campaigning for president. "We are getting into huge budgets to run for president at around $2,000." Manis is concerned that "regular" students can't afford to run for president.

"Sean has well over $1,500," she said. Manis believes King also has about an equal amount and that most campaign money comes from either candidates' pockets, the pockets of their parents' or from loans.

also said that HJR 16 could be overridden in cases such as these. Personally, Brandt said she was concerned by the lack of a method of enforcing the amendment. She also said she would have liked Idaho legislators to attach a section in the amendment that provided enforcement, which was the main point of debate.

Mosman emphasized how the amendment would provide a right that victims could point to and demand recognition.

Brandt, however, questioned whether some court officials would actually take the amendment into consideration.

In response to this, Mosman said he believed that the amendment provided a mechanism for other influences to come in to play. "As the Constitution is implemented, some teeth will be added," Mosman said.

The point of whether this needed to be a full constitutional amendment or just a statute also came into play. Brandt thought that it would still be effective as a statute and a way to implement it would also be established. Mosman, however, said that it needed to be a Constitutional Amendment because the Constitution always has precedence over a statute. "It is a fundamental right," Mosman said.

Although the two debated how the amendment would be implemented and what it would mean to future court proceedings, both agreed that HJR 16 served a good purpose and both said they supported victim's rights.

The HJR 16 discussion was the second of two informational forums put on by the Women's Center.

FUEL

$2.80 per gallon.

The UI biodiesel is even more expensive due to high labor and materials costs. Peterson said that biodiesel anywhere is not any less expensive or economically comparable to conventional diesel, which sells for about $1.30 per gallon at a gas station.

But the cost of the process does not diminish the environmental benefits of biodiesel. Peterson said that future uses of the fuel will most likely be in areas where the safety and non-toxicity of biodiesel is needed. He said that rapeseed oil is a viable alternative to regular diesel on a limited basis.

In addition to the truck that made the cross-country journey, the Agricultural Engineering Program also has two farm tractors and two other pickups that operate on a 20 percent rapeseed oil blend. According to Peterson, the tests and research done on these other vehicles is partially funded by the U.S. Department of Energy. While in Washington this summer, The Department of Energy also gave Peterson a "Best in Transportation" award for his work with biodiesel.

On another stop last summer in Los Angeles, the biodiesel truck underwent emissions tests. The results from those tests showed reductions in hydrocarbons and carbon monoxide emissions from the truck.

Blood drive slated for next week

Dennis Sasse

Staff

By the time you have finished reading this paragraph another person will need a pint of blood. How long will it be until someone you love needs blood?

Today only 4 percent of the population gives blood. Every 12 seconds someone needs the vital bodily fluid, according to Lisa Gravelle, co-chair of this year's blood drive.

The University of Idaho blood drive is scheduled to begin at 10 a.m. Tuesday. The Red Cross hopes that more than 4 percent of the UI student body will donate. The blood drive will be held on the second floor of the Student Union in the Appaloosa room. Hours are 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. on Tuesday and Wednesday and from 9 a.m. to 2 p.m. on Thursday.

Gravelle said the living group that donates the most blood will receive the "blood drive traveling trophy." It is recommended that volunteers sign up for a time at the Student Union information desk because the Red Cross is more efficient when they have a schedule to follow. Gravelle said that students who forget to sign up can still stop by to donate.

"Everyone is welcome, not just students," she said.

The Red Cross has re-structured the donation procedure so that it is now quicker to give blood. In the past, most Red Cross workers were volunteers. Today most of the blood collecting is done by paid staff. The Red Cross enacted the change so they could give their employees better training in proper blood handling techniques.

Donors should be in good health and weigh at least 110 pounds, should not have had a transfusion in the past year nor should they be in an AIDS high risk group.

Gravelle said, "In the past we've had outstanding participation. UI has a good record of giving."

Free juice and cookies will be available to donors.

Haitian police daunt U.S. efforts

Todd Robberson
The Washington Post

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti—The long road ahead for U.S. and foreign advisers working to retrain the reviled Haitian police force is perhaps best illustrated by the experience of a newly installed precinct chief, Maj. Dany Toussaint.

When he got word of a discipline problem among the 134 men under his command on Monday, his first response was to put on a bullet-proof vest.

"I'm not saying I don't trust them," he said, but he nevertheless regards some of his men as murderers who would gladly have killed him during the 1991 military coup that forced President Jean-Bertrand Aristide into exile. Toussaint said he already has had three desertions since taking command of his suburban Port-au-Prince precinct two weeks ago.

Few, if any, Haitians place much trust in their men in blue, given the national police force's primary role in ousting Aristide and then enforcing the coup with a nationwide reign of terror, beatings, rapes and the killing of thousands of civilians.

Today, however, remnants of that same police force are being trained under U.S. Justice Department supervision to take over security duties when American and other multinational peacekeepers go home.

Thanks to a six-week sweep by U.S. forces, the guns of Haiti's former military dictators are largely off the streets, and the only Haitians now authorized to carry firearms are the police. But that prospect, Toussaint indicated, is a compelling enough reason to keep his body armor handy.

A former bodyguard of Aristide's, Toussaint narrowly escaped death after the coup by riding on horseback to the Dominican Republic. Policemen looted his house and sprayed it with bullets.

"The people who did it are now under my command. That hurts a little bit. But I must honor my president's appeal of 'no vengeance,'" he explained.

"I don't have the authority to fire everyone. So I have to build confidence and see whether they can change."

Elsewhere in Haiti, police are slowly returning to barracks in the apparent hope that their old jobs remain. Some communities have accepted them back without question.

Others are subjected to elaborate rituals, in which they dip their hands in water, symbolically washing blood away.

U.S. and foreign advisers are working with trusted officers like Toussaint, who attended an American police academy during his exile, in hopes of creating a national police force that is respected rather than feared and hated. But the process has been arduous, U.S. officials acknowledge.

Parliament has yet to ratify a constitutional amendment formally separating the army and police, which previously were drawn from a single military force. In addition, the vast majority of police fled into hiding when U.S. forces arrived and had to be coaxed back to work by U.S. military police and international trainers on contract to the Justice Department.

"I definitely feel more secure with the U.S. troops here," said a policeman inside, who identified himself only as Sgt. Caesar.

"There are still many people here who supported the coup. If the Americans went away, we'd all be attacked."

"One of my men was out on foot patrol last week with a policeman when someone walked up and said, 'How can you walk with this guy?

He killed my brother,'" said Lt. Erica Vodak, a U.S. Army military police supervisor.

"It kind of makes you think. We come in here to restore democracy, and they've got us out walking around with murderers. Ninety percent of these guys are probably corrupt, and if the whole police department is corrupt, what are you going to do?"

Cary Hoover, coordinator of a U.S. program to cull and retrain the police force, described the continued employment of officers from the old force as a "stopgap measure" to provide some semblance of security on the streets, since nobody else in Haiti has any similar experience.

By early next year, an entirely new force is to be created from civilian recruits and existing police whose security records are cleared through U.S. and Haitian intelligence databases. If intelligence shows any sign of unexplained enrichment, criminal activity or human rights abuses, it is grounds for expulsion, said Brig. Gen. John Meade, commander of the U.S. ground forces in Haiti.

Those who are expelled, he added, will receive U.S. assistance to find a civilian job. Despite the appearance that the United States might be rewarding them in a country with a 70 percent urban unemployment rate, Meade said, "the last thing you want is a disgruntled, disenfranchised group out on the streets who might still have guns and also have military training."

The current Justice Department training course, which graduated its first group of 334 trainees last Saturday, is a week-long series of classes on police ethics and nonviolent methods of maintaining public security. During one session last week, a trainee was overheard asking a teacher, "Can we still beat people?"

Arizona Democrat promises gay marriages

The Washington Post
Arizona supermarket magnate Eddie Basha, one of the few Democrats leading an incumbent Republican governor in the polls—although that lead has been dropping—said he would sign legislation to legalize homosexual marriages. "If gays want to be married ... I think that's their privilege," Basha told reporters after the issue surfaced this week in a radio debate in Phoenix.

Basha said it is a civil rights issue, but Gov. Fife Symington (R) said he would veto such a measure. Libertarian John Buttrick said he would go further than Basha and allow gay couples to adopt children.

Basha campaign spokeswoman Pam Kleckner charged the governor's supporters have been trying to use the issue against Basha. "It's just something they're trying to stir up," she said.

"Basha has a record of working for more than a decade with every group.... His embracing of nondiscriminatory activities is not new."

Symington campaign spokesman Doug Cole denied the governor was attempting to run on the issue, but did not deny reports in Arizona newspapers that some of Symington's supporters have been using Basha's statement in an attempt to cut into Basha's support. "The campaign is not involved in that," Cole said. "We're running on three issues—the governor's record of reducing taxes, education reform and, lastly, anti-crime."

Committees and their financial support of many federal incumbents.

"At the local level, campaign money does not come from PACs," Greene said.

She claimed that it is easier for a federal incumbent to get money from PACs and therefore get elected due to receiving excessive funds and support.

Holst agreed with Greene, but also said that the money should be spent on someone who is trying hard to get their foot in the door rather than on an incumbent.

A case from Arkansas concerning the constitutionality of term limits on congressional officials will go to the U.S. Supreme Court at the end of this month. A decision should be reached by spring of next year.

Proposition Two will read as follows on the Nov. 8 ballot:

Initiative relating to the number of years an elected official may serve: Providing a new section to the Idaho Code, §34-907, limiting the number of years a person may serve in the following elected offices by restricting eligibility to appear on the ballot after serving a prescribed number of years: United States House of Representatives, United States Senate, State Executive Offices, State Legislature, County Elected Offices...

Shall the above-entitled measure proposed by Proposition Two be approved?

Negative ads used in hope of scaring fundamentalists

Paul West
The Baltimore Sun

MARIETTA, Ga.—Here in the middle of the Bible Belt, a Democratic congressman has been airing a campaign commercial in which his opponent uses the word "scumbags," language sure to offend any God-fearing Georgian.

Which is exactly the point. Like Democratic candidates around the country this fall, Rep. George "Buddy" Darden is trying to demonize his challenger. His goal is to scare away the Republican's fundamentalist Christian backers, whose votes could make the difference in this closely fought race.

The growing use of negative advertising to undermine the support of religious conservative voters is powerful testimony to the influence of the so-called religious right, which has become a force to be reckoned with in American politics.

By most estimates, conservative Christians make up between one-fourth and one-third of the Republican vote nationwide, and they are expected to have a big say in the selection of the party's 1996 presidential ticket.

Right now, they are angry with President Clinton and the Democrats, and opinion surveys indicate they are itching to vote. One recent national poll found that 71 percent of fundamentalists say they're following the midterm-elections with a "great deal" of interest, a level of intensity that far exceeds that of Democrats and liberals, and, for that matter, other Republicans.

"In this year's election, you will see the largest percentage ever of self-identified Christian evangelical voters," predicts Ralph E. Reed Jr., executive director of the Christian Coalition, the organization founded in 1989 by the religious broadcaster Pat Robertson that is now leading the conservative religious movement. "There will be big changes, thanks to the Christian vote, in races for House seats, Senate seats and governors."

One of many races the Christian Coalition has targeted is that of Darden, a moderate Democrat whose down-home personal style and influence as a member of the Defense Appropriations subcommittee have served him well, up to now, in this northwest Georgia district, where Lockheed Corp.'s military aircraft factory is the largest private employer.

In the past, a Democrat like Darden, who delivers for his district in the form of multibillion-dollar defense contracts and takes a conservative line on social issues (he voted against federal funding for abortion and against lifting the ban on gays in the military), would not seem a likely target for conservative Christians. But his district is now solidly Republican and his record fails to meet the more stringent standards of the Christian Coalition, which flunked him for his vote in favor of the Clinton budget, among others.

With his political career on the line, Darden recently launched a negative TV ad that tries to chip away at his opponent's religious support by portraying the Republican as a hypocrite.

"Bob Barr says he's the candidate of family values," declares Darden's attack ad. "Don't you think a candidate who preaches family values ought to practice family values?"

To make his case, Darden used a 1987 newspaper interview in which Barr uttered the word "scumbags" (to describe some clients he had defended as a criminal lawyer), plus a $613 medical bill that Barr's ex-wife went to court over in the mid-1980s after their bitter divorce. The ex-wife has come to Barr's defense and assailed Darden for dredging the matter up.

In other races, particularly in areas of the South and Midwest with many religious conservatives, other Democrats are making similar efforts to suppress their opponents' evangelical support by raising character questions that might strike a nerve with conservative Christians.

In Georgia's governor's race, for example, incumbent Democrat Zell Miller, facing a tougher than expected challenge from businessman Guy Millner, is running ads that highlight the Republican's stock holdings in Las Vegas casinos.

In a hard-fought North Carolina congressional contest, Democrat Richard Moore is airing TV ads which question whether his conservative Republican opponent, David Funderburk, "shares our values." The ad charges that Funderburk owes money from a past campaign and "even attacked the Rev. Billy Graham," as the camera zooms in on a page from a Funderburk book which states that the famous evangelist "was duped by Communist officials."

While Democratic candidates in some parts of the country may still try to score points by labeling their opponents as tools of religious extremists, that sort of rhetoric can backfire. Last summer, in an apparent effort to fire up the Democratic base, Rep. Vic Fazio of California, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, criticized Republicans for being willing to turn over their party to the "intolerant ... religious right," only to find himself accused of "Christian-bashing" and intolerance in response.

"Democrats make a grave mistake when they beard the lion or religious-bash, because they are forfeiting votes along the way,"

says Alan Secrest, a pollster for Democratic congressional candidates. He predicts the Christian Coalition will have a "significant impact" on next week's elections.

The most visible product of the Christian Coalition's campaign activities will be about 33 million "voter guides," to be distributed through thousands of churches across the country Sunday. Though the organization does not formally endorse candidates, Democrats say the guides are slanted to favor candidate—almost always the Republican.

Proposition One useless legislation

Proposition One reads:

"No state agency, department or political subdivision shall grant minority status to persons who engage in homosexual behavior; providing that same-sex marriages and domestic partnerships shall not be legally recognized; providing that elementary and secondary school educators shall not discuss homosexuality as acceptable behavior; providing that no state funds shall be expended in a manner that has the effect of accepting or approving homosexuality; limiting to adults access to library materials which address homosexuality; providing that private sexual practices may be considered non-job factors in public employment; and providing a severability clause."

Proposition One is the most worthless piece of legislation ever to hit the Idaho ballot. For starters, it's a useless law that doesn't even address a problem, but a possible problem that in actuality will never come up. It is also poorly written and will require a mess of interpretation that will inevitably end up destroying American freedom. Last of all, it sets a dangerous precedent for discrimination.

The basic remise of the law is unnecessary. Homosexuals will never ask for minority status, and any agency that awards them special rights will quickly get blown up by some right wing homophobe. In this society, homosexuals who ask for special rights are basically asking for a beating, and homosexuals know that. When society's gut reaction to homosexuals finally changes, minority status will also be unnecessary and obsolete. For this fundamental reason, Proposition One is a waste of paper and resources.

The portion that provides for private sexual practices to be considered non-job factors in public employment—this is already how it is, or should be. Ironically, this last one should benefit job-hunting homosexuals. That way homosexuals wouldn't be discriminated against by the few misdirected homophobes that ruin things for the rest of the population.

Last of all, Proposition One would set a dangerous precedent for homosexual discrimination and bigotry. Even though the proposition doesn't come right out and say it explicitly, the intent of the legislation cannot be ignored.

It says homosexual behavior is wrong and for that reason cannot be discussed. It whispers that homosexuals are lesser humans, and because of that, can be treated as such. Even if some of the population believes that, the proposition won't help. Only a healthy dose of self-security and esteem can do that.

Textbooks need blood, gore

Last night, I broke down and purchased Stephen King's latest omnibus novel, Insomnia.

Compared to his usual stuff, it's lightweight (only 782 pages), so I figured it would make a nice light read. I began reading it, and soon found myself gripped with my own form of insomnia. I read the first third of the book before I could bring myself to turn out the light.

Today, as I was pushing through the joys of my Engineering Physics textbook (weight: about twice as much as my Subaru) and being incredibly bored by it, a thought occurred to me. If major authors like King and John Irving can write novels that are incredibly long and still hold our interest, why the hell can't we get interesting textbooks that are nowhere near as long?

Most texts are less than 500 pages, especially the higher in your course of study you go. It shouldn't be too much of a stretch to spice them up, especially math books. The best ones only manage to elevate word problems to an exercise in puerile humor; at worst, they turn word problems into the exact antithesis of caffeine. It's not just math, either; most, if not all, of the scientific textbooks in existence, covering topics from quaternions to quantum physics, are so incredibly dull that hyperkinetic people have trouble staying awake. This trend needs to change, before students start drowning in drool.

Imagine what you'd have if, say, Clive Barker were to write a physics textbook. You'd read a story where you found a Chinese puzzle box in your laundry, and it would lead up to a problem where you would be asked to calculate the vector sum of the needles Pinhead shoves through your tortured body. Of course, Americans have a hard enough time with science; coupling it with nightmares might not be the wisest course.

Danielle Steel could write a math text. It may seem like a rather silly choice on the face of it, but think about it. The section on integration would be the most avidly read, with derivatives being a close second (for those who really want a family someday). Harlequin could start an award-winning line of math guides, and American test scores would shoot through the roof. Everyone would be happy.

Anne Rice...well, I'm not sure what her books would be for. Maybe sections on manic depression, mythology and sex education; anything drenched in fashionable Gothic gloom would be suitable. Better her than, say, Victoria Holt or V.C. Andrews. Ugh.

Stephen King is turning into the general practitioner of the novelist world, so we'll let him loose wherever he wants to go. Ditto for Piers Anthony, although he becomes more of a hack as he gets older. If we really want to get things cooking, we'd team up William Gibson and Bill Gates and let them develop their own line of computer science textbooks. I can just see it now: UI orders Black Ice: The Microsoft Guide to Cyberspace for all their CS courses. Computer Security would never be the same, not to mention the sudden increase in computer-related deaths.

The possibilities are astounding. Graphic novel electronics texts, psychology explained in iambic pentameter; the melding of literature and technical writing could pave the way to a brand new method of assimilating information. Hell, some possibilities are just begging for the merging. What would be more appropriate than an entomology text written and illustrated by Gary Larsen? Hey, it could happen.

It's time to boycott Mentos, get rid of annoying advertising

There is an evil force at work in the world today. This evil force is not Satan, even though he is the master of evil. It is not Barney the Purple Dinosaur, even though he is second only to Satan in his utter villainy. No, it is not even that sickly sweet sit-com, Full House. This wretchedly horrible evil that I speak of is none other than that innocent-enough-looking roll of candy: "MENTOS"!!!

MENTOS is the undisputed king of annoying-as-hell television commercials. Most people, being rational, either ignore these advertisements or change the channel. Myself, being a non-rational person, simply put my foot through the television screen. This is extremely satisfying (though not as ultimately fulfilling as shooting the television with a shotgun, but alas, I do not own a gun) but it tends to be rather costly, so I have to limit myself to kicking out the television screen only once a week. The rest of the week, I have to jump up and down, swearing and pulling my hair out until my roommate hits me with a baseball bat to get me to shut up. Then I sit quietly in the corner, bleeding and singing that stupid MENTOS jingle, "doo-doo-doo-doo-doo-doo, doo-ahh!" and going into fits of maniacal laughter off and on for about two hours. This happens every time a MENTOS commercial comes on. Believe me, it's not a pretty sight.

I began to realize that if these commercials (which feature European-looking youngsters pretending to be mannequins in malls and lifting compact cars out of tight parallel parking spaces) annoy me so much, they must at least mildly grate on the nerves of normal people. So, with a team of investigative reporters from the Argonaut by my side, I set off to get to the bottom of these stupid commercials. My mission: to find out who the hell makes these commercials, and what obviously foreign country they come from.

I discovered more than I wanted to know. The secrets I discovered could have killed a weaker-stomached journalist, but not me! I knew that I must save humanity! I must save the world from this diabolical MENTOS plot! I must... GET ON WITH IT!!!

Oh, sorry, I guess I was drifting off into one of my superhero fantasies. I promise it won't happen again. But what I discovered will curdle your blood. Here are the facts:

When I called up the head of the FCC, he gave me this information: Several years ago, NASA began receiving messages from outer space. These messages stated that if the Earth did not comply with several requests, it would be destroyed by an alien death-ray. I then contacted the head of NASA, and he gave me the aliens' list of demands: EARTHLINGS! You must do the following to escape annihilation:

1. You must show a series of mind-numbing commercials featuring a product named MENTOS on cable television until the population becomes so brain dead that it will be ready for an alien fascist ruler.
2. You must drug the populace with a powerful tranquilizer also known as MENTOS so that they will blindly follow the aforementioned alien fascist ruler.
3. You must cleverly disguise the MENTOS commercials as some foreign-type candy advertisements.
4. You must cleverly disguise the MENTOS drug as an innocent candy product.

5. You must send us some more Jerry Lewis videotapes. We love him up here!

There you have it, folks! It is obvious that our wonderful planet is facing invasion by some evil race of alien beings who are drugging us with MENTOS candy and slowly driving us insane with these annoying MENTOS commercials so that when the fascist alien ruler takes power, it will look as though a savior has come to rid us of our torment and we will all be led blindly to the gas chambers.

So I make this final appeal to you, Humans, before it is too late: We must boycott MENTOS! Quit buying their candy! Start a letter-writing campaign to pull their ads off of television.

Hell, even if they point their death-ray at Earth and blow it to tiny bits, at least we won't have to watch those damn stupid commercials anymore!

When you breathe, you inspire; when you don't, you expire

The other day, I had to go into the Faculty Office Building to drop off a paper. Seated outside, on the step, was a man wasting all your money, and slowly killing yourself, but apparently there are growing numbers of people that do. Everywhere I go there are people walking with cigarettes, people lounging in doorways with cigarettes, and sadly but rather humorously smoking under ventilation ducts bearing large signs that say "Do not smoke here. Air intake."

I don't know if smokers know this, but most non-smokers can smell a smoker at forty paces. It isn't a good smell, either. I remember one fellow who would have a smoke every day before class and come in smelling like he spent the last six weeks fighting a forest fire and never changing clothes. He would then sit down by me, and by the end of the class I would be wheezing and sneezing and have the headache from hell. His only recognition of my discomfort was to snicker when I had to blow my nose. I seriously considered setting his hair on fire—the logical culmination of my anger at his stale cigarette smell; I was, after all, already miserable, so a little more smoke wouldn't matter.

Smoking is unhealthy for a lot of reasons, not the least of which is the damage it can do to one's lungs. I know smokers have heard it a million times, but maybe they should pay attention to what it is doing to the people around them. I am severely allergic to the smoke—it causes my bronchia to shut; a lot of other people I know also experience upper respiratory discomfort from tobacco smoke.

I watched my grandmother die with emphysema, and it was not nice. For her, breathing was a luxury. It took her years to finally expire, and when she did, the family was so happy that her suffering was ended that we didn't even grieve. And this is only one of several nasty ways a smoker can go. I'd rather take my chances in a car wreck.

Contrary to a popular belief that circulates among smokers I know, the habit affects the health of those around you as well as yourself. Smoking has become a major deciding factor in custody battles, for example, because children who grow up in a smoking household have a better chance of recurring upper respiratory problems than those who don't.

Smoking is a sign of weakness—a sign that you are succumbing to peer pressure and the whims of society. Be strong—quit smoking. I know a lot of people who have. It was a difficult undertaking, but aren't all things that are truly rewarding?

smoking a pipe. I'm very happy this person decided to take his stinky habit outdoors, but I still had to walk through the thick fog of smoke in order to enter the building. Why, you ask, did I not enter through another door? To which my answer is this: Why should I have to? I shouldn't. However, I did attempt to exit the building by another door, knowing that the pipe-smoker would still be there; dropping the paper off only took a moment. And what did I find? Yet another smoker, firmly ensconced in the doorway, puffing away. And what did I do? Well, I ducked through the doorway as quickly as I could (a repeat from my entrance), and then promptly fell gasping to the ground like a fish out of water because my very picky bronchia decided to close off due to lack of fresh air (well, maybe I didn't fall, but almost). Not breathing is unpleasant at best, dead at worst.

It seems to me that recently smoking has become a lot more vogue. I don't see what's so glamorous about smelling vile,

LaRocco has real stands on issues

Helen Chenoweth has challenged First District Congressman Larry LaRocco to address the issues affecting Idaho—a challenge that was unnecessary, because Congressman LaRocco has been addressing these issues for the past several years. Important issues, such as wilderness management, reproductive choice, public education, deficit reduction, and jobs have been the focus of Congressman LaRocco's campaign. But Helen Chenoweth continues to skirt the issues, avoid the questions, and divert the voters' attention with "smoke and mirrors." To help refocus the debate, I will try to offer some comparisons, based on their stated positions.

Helen Chenoweth has stated that she is anti-choice, in all situations—even in cases of rape and incest. Congressman LaRocco has been a continuous advocate for reproductive choice.

Helen Chenoweth is the ONLY major candidate who favors the discriminatory, unconstitutional Proposition One. Congressman LaRocco was the first public official to oppose the movement.

Helen Chenoweth wants to mine the Sawtooth Mountains and build hydroelectric projects along the pristine Snake River. Congressman LaRocco has worked tirelessly to add balance to the wilderness debate and to prevent outside attempts at taking Idaho's water.

Helen Chenoweth wants to cut over $100 million in federal funding to all levels of education, within our state alone, by cutting the Department of Education. Congressman LaRocco has been a true friend of students and education, pushing for improved public education and more access to student loans.

Speaking as a "natural resource consultant," Helen Chenoweth has been quoted as saying the E. coli bacteria is on the Endangered Species list and that the Sockeye salmon is not even endangered...huh?

Helen Chenoweth claims she wants to stay focused on "important Idaho issues" but, in reality, refuses to discuss them. I feel that after careful consideration of the real issues that affect Idaho, you will have no trouble choosing the best candidate to vote for on Nov. 8—Congressman Larry LaRocco.

Prop. One not about rights

Proposition One: you've heard all the arguments pro and con in this disputatious season, probably ad nauseam, and I hesitate to add my rock to the already high pile of rhetoric. But I just want to say that the central issue is not about special rights and it's not about personal morality. The issue is justice: among other odious things, this initiative would compromise the safety of homosexual people and their access to, among other goods, housing and jobs that others take for granted.

Strike a blow for justice. Vote no on Proposition One.

Vote Vandal, pick Batt

Latah County voters should look closely at the differences between the two serious candidates for governor. Our next governor and his appointees will make many decisions that will affect the University of Idaho and Moscow over the next four years.

One of the candidates was educated out of state and has little understanding of what student life is like at UI. Even though he's on TV all the time—forget about him.

Instead, vote for a Vandal! Phil Batt is an alumni of UI. He's an innovative leader in Idaho agriculture and specializes in hops research. He understands the importance of UI's living groups.

Show your Vandal spirit and vote for Phil Batt on Nov. 8!

Christians should repent

In a letter published last Friday, Michael Rogers approvingly cites a passage from Paul's letter to the Romans, in which the apostle points to widespread homosexual practice in the contemporary Graeco-Roman world as a sign of idolatry and lawlessness among the non-Jewish nations or "Gentiles." By isolating these remarks from their context and using them as a proof-text to condemn gays and lesbians, however, he misses Paul's entire point.

The point, of course, is that all have sinned and fall short of God's glory. Paul quickly follows his allusion to Gentile degeneracy with an attack on the hypocritical posturing of those within his own community of birth who considered themselves righteous. In judging others, Paul warns, they condemn themselves.

Homosexuals have long been misused as scapegoats for our collective sexual guilts and anxieties. To read Mr. Rogers, one might think that the scourge of sexually transmitted disease would vanish, if only homosexuals would! And if we listened long enough to the hysteria from some quarters about homosexual personnel in the schools, we might forget that almost all sexual victimization of children occurs at the hands of respectable heterosexual folks, just like us.

Mr. Rogers makes much of Paul's description of ancient Graeco-Roman homosexual practice as "unnatural" (in Greek: para phusin "contrary to nature"). He asserts: "God...gives us no reason to believe He would ever change His mind about what he declares to be natural." That is not the view that I see expressed in Romans. Paul employs the term para phusin once again later in the epistle, to describe God's unexpected change of heart toward the Gentiles. Using a horticultural metaphor, he speaks of the Gentiles as a wild olive branch which God has "unnaturally" grafted onto the cultivated tree of Israel. It is through this divine act "against nature" that we Gentiles become members in the community of God's own people.

In terms of Paul's metaphor, most Christians today are offshoots of this unnatural graft. Now, if God has undergone a change of heart and acted "against nature" to welcome us in, who are we to say that the same grace is not likewise to be extended to gays and lesbians? Our welcome was never made contingent on our giving up our own ethnic identities and becoming Jewish; on that point Paul was adamant. Then how dare we demand that gays and lesbians deny their own sexual nature and pretend to be what they are not, before we (let alone God) can welcome them? Or do we choose (as Paul puts it) to despise the riches of God's kindness?

It can be argued that the pederastic model of homosexual practice that Paul knew in his time was fundamentally abusive and, if you will, "perverted;" the present-day model of caring, committed adult relationships among persons who know themselves to be homosexual by nature may be a different thing entirely. I will not pursue that argument here. I simply want to plead with fellow Christians: let's not use our voices or our ballots to promote a spirit of intolerance. The more righteous such a "witness" makes you feel, the more certain you can be that it has nothing at all to do with the gospel. Consider how well Paul's warning in the second chapter of Romans applies to us today: God's name is blasphemed among unbelievers, because of our self-righteous hypocrisy. Let's repent of this foolishness now, before we do even more damage.

Moeller, Perry a winning team

Typically speaking, what do you, as a student, know about the ASUI? Likely very little—that will all change when Brad Moeller and Leonard Perry are elected to office on Nov. 16. They are a team that has proven leadership at Idaho for years. Leonard, leading the Vandals in Basketball and Brad in the ASUI.

When this team is elected to office, they will change the image of the ASUI and make it a more approachable organization. They will do this by providing bi-monthly reports through student media which will create ASUI knowledge at everyone's disposal.

Let's take the politics out of ASUI once and for all—elect Moeller and Perry for ASUI President and Vice-President on Nov. 16!

LaRocco right for Idaho

With only a week left in this campaign, the Election Day stage has been set. The candidates have spoken, the stands have been taken, the proposals have been put forth. For whom will Idahoans vote? We will have to wait a few days. For whom should Idahoans vote? The answer to this question is much easier: Democratic Congressman Larry LaRocco.

Congressman LaRocco has proven what he can do and has done FOR his First District constituency; Helen Chenoweth has indicated through numerous foolish statements and renegade proposals what she would do TO Idaho. It is little wonder that LaRocco's lead over Chenoweth in the latest polls is in the double-digits. With this information in mind, any action from Chenoweth's camp from now until Nov. 8 can be rightfully viewed as desperate.

One sure sign of desperation would be if Chenoweth's supporters start to mass-mail letters or postcards to students in a last-minute attempt to narrow the gap between LaRocco and Mrs. Chenoweth. I have heard of this happening on other campuses under similar campaign situations. One cannot foresee whether this will happen on our campus, but if it does we will certainly see just how vulnerable is Chenoweth's campaign. I urge all voters to study closely both Congressional candidates, for I am absolutely convinced that all will find only one logical choice: our hard-working Congressman Larry LaRocco!

Moscow helped Homecoming

We would like to take the time to thank some campus and community individuals for helping make this year's University of Idaho Homecoming Parade a huge success. In the community, we appreciate Wally Orvik Motors, James Toyota and Chipman and Taylor for loaning cars for dignitaries; Phil Gatlin, Moscow Fire Chief, for judging and the Moscow Fire department for providing trucks in the parade and an ambulance on standby; and the Moscow Police Department for closing off the streets and beginning the parade with two vehicles.

On campus, we would like to thank Al Gemberling for organizing the band entries; Andy Hansen for announcing the parade; Dee Rupe and William Doelle for judging the parade; the men of Phi Gamma Delta for driving dignitary cars and helping to orchestrate the parade; Heidi Feller, Missy Wilson and Amy Birge for helping to set up this event; ASUI Sub Systems for coordinating the sound system; the ROTC units on campus for organizing a joint color guard; Dave Hood for supplying two-way radios; David Mucci for providing tables and chairs; and June and Orval Hansen for being our Grand Marshals.

Most of all, we would like to thank the person who is responsible for the inside planning and creativity of so many ASUI events. She has endless energy and is always supportive of the students. We love ya, Jan Abramson. Things wouldn't get done without you!

Thanks to everyone for your support!

Examines your embarrassments

"I can't believe you did that! How embarrassing!" is a common expression heard from friends as you tell them how you tripped down the administration stairs after class, as if you MEANT to fall down the stairs in front of ogling spectators. But, GEEZ, it happens to the best of us, even you:

"Being pulled over by a cop while wearing boxers when my girlfriend was with me and the officer suggested I put my pants back on."

—Tom Fisher

"I walked in late from a party and my roommate was having sex with her boyfriend and they kept doing it! In fact, my roommate tried to have a conversation with me!"

—Anonymous

"I saw a lady at church who I mistook for my mom. She was real surprised after I slapped her on the butt!"

Once again it's the weekend and WHAT TO DO? Take a video camera to the Library and pretend you are doing a class project, asking non-suspecting students questions ranging from silly to major environmental or political issues and see what kind of B.S. answers you get.

Q: What do you think of NAFTA?

A: Yeah, I like that band.

Q: Do you think hunting wild animals should be banned?

A: Yes, of course.

Q: Then what did you have for dinner?

A: Uh, a T-bone steak.

Q: Is E-Coli on the endangered species list?

A: Of course, Helen Chenoweth said it was! And they say we're stupid and uneducated!

'Embraceable You' opens at Prichard

This evening the University of Idaho Prichard Art Gallery will be hosting a reception for the opening of its new exhibition, "Embraceable You: Recent Abstract Painting." "Embraceable You" is a contemporary survey of the current state of abstraction with the emphasis focusing on the diversity of approaches being practiced today.

"This exhibition is a result of a resurgence of abstract paintings in the late 1980's," said Prichard Gallery Curator Wally Mason. "Most art today deals with social issues.

But there are many people today making competent paintings that don't deal with social issues, and are happy to be doing so. It's painting just for the sake of painting."

Abstract art developed in the early part of the 20th century, between 1906 and 1910.

"Abstract art is difficult to understand and accept. It intimidates people," said Mason. "People want to make meaning out of the visual medium."

The group of artists that make up this exhibition are all artists currently exhibiting in the United States and in Europe.

"Embraceable You" includes works by Mary Hambleton, Melissa Meyer, David Row, Cary Smith and Juan Usle of New York, and Charles Fine, Robin Mitchell and Marc Pally of the Los Angeles area.

"All of these artists are mid-career, well known painters whose work is slightly out of fashion right now.

The art world is becoming more and more like the fashion world every day," said Mason. "Fashion is all about recycling styles; so is art. Only people who are fearful of abstract painting say it's dead."

Due to the complex nature of the works, each of the artists will be represented by only two works, one large scale work and one sketch or small painting. The small scale works are being shown on the upstairs floor of the gallery and the large scale works are being shown downstairs.

This is being done so that the large scale paintings can be viewed from a distance, while the smaller paintings can be viewed more closely and intimately.

"There is a difference in the way the works look, and that difference is intentional," Mason said.

"People have a tendency to love or hate this kind of work, and that love or hate is based on time. It's not always easy to see abstract art. Sometimes it takes a while to unfold."

"Embraceable You" will be showing at the Prichard Gallery until Dec. 4, when it will move to its next stop at the University of Alabama. "Normally it would be up longer, it is on tour," said Mason.

While the works on display are not for sale, all of the artists are collected in the United States and in Europe. "Most of the artists' works are in permanent collections and are not displayed for the purpose of sales," said Mason. "All of the artists have dealers in New York and Los Angeles."

Mason said he feels that it is important to show this kind of work. "These artists may not always get the biggest photographs in the magazines," he said. "But they are all heavily collected. Art doesn't have to deal with social issues. There is a place for this kind of art, I think it reflects the country becoming more romantic in its culture."

The Prichard Gallery is located at 414/416 S. Main Street in Moscow and is open to the public at no charge.

Gallery hours are 10 a.m. to 8 p.m. Monday through Friday and 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. Saturdays. The gallery is closed Sundays and through the Thanksgiving holiday.

Eighth annual Tubaween kills Barney

Shelby Beck

staff

That purple dinosaur Barney joined the Lionel Hampton School of Music Tuba section Halloween night for the eighth annual Tubaween concert when they roused the audience with both humor and music.

The evening began with the piece "Fjord Sounds" composed by UI music student Mike Lemieux. The cast of tuba and euphonium players entered the stage dressed as vikings, or, rather, vandals. They played along with a pre-recorded accompaniment of synthesized sounds. The euphoniums had the melody while the tubas accompanied them with a single low note played to a rhythm of their choice.

At this point, several vandals circled and bowed to a single tuba placed at center stage. Meanwhile, something went amiss...the accompaniment began playing the Barney theme song. Barney, played by music education student Randy Paddock, waddled out on stage with a big grin and stole their idol. They spent the rest of the evening hunting Barney between numbers.

Next, Vic Engblom performed "Air and Bourree" by J.S. Bach. He was accompanied by pianist Nikki Crossley. The first part, Air, was a slow and dark piece, while Bourree, a dance, picked up the pace to become fast and light. Both musicians appeared to have some trouble in the middle, but they pushed through and ended strongly.

Between songs, the vandals, grunting and yelling, chased Barney through the aisles of the Recital Hall.

Bryce Quarve settled down to perform "Capriccio for Tuba and Marimba" by William Penn. A 20th century piece, it incorporated more modern writing techniques than other pieces played that evening.

The audience howled again when Barney waddled out on stage, impersonating the percussionist, and plucked out his own theme on marimba.

Glen Zollman performed the Allegro movement from Edward Gregson's "Concerto for Tuba." The piece is standard tuba literature, and usually played with an orchestra or a wind ensemble. Zollman was accompanied by Roger Evans.

Tuba player Shawn Hauserman and percussionist Bill Schwarz followed with three movements of "Suite Tuba, with Drum Set" by James Jorgenson. Written in 1975 for a graduate student at the University of Southern California, it is a five movement piece that explores the full range of both instruments and is based on rhythm rather than melody.

Hauserman said that to his knowledge the piece is unpublished and his performance may possibly be only about the fifth time it has been played before an audience.

Kevin McDonald performed the technically difficult "Believe Me If All Those Endearing Young Charms" by Simone Mantia, leaping from the bottom range to the top of the range in quick paced intervals during the cadenza. Pianist Joey Wellman accompanied.

After McDonald's performance, the audience screamed with laughter as a group of tuba players hunted down Barney, seated in the audience, with semi-auto squirt guns while the rest of the tubas encouragingly played the theme to Peter Gunn.

Barney was captured and subsequently beheaded during the group performance of "March to the Scaffold" from Symphonie Fantastique by Hector Berlioz. This dark French piece used accidentals for color. Written in 1830, it was one of the most important products of its period.

The evening ended with Grand Finale by Mike Lemieux, a reprise of Fjord Sounds, that metamorphosed into "Go, Vandals." The audience stood and applauded loudly as Barney stumbled around, headless, dying slowly.

O'CONNOR CLAIMS TO BE THE 'UNIVERSAL MOTHER'

Quiet piano, a well-rounded musical repertoire, and a powerful message describe Sinéad O'Connor's new album, Universal Mother. The album itself is packed with a musical message about life, love, children, motherhood, and the historical struggles of Ireland, her homeland. O'Connor wrote most of the album, with the exception of a few tracks, and one remake of a Nirvana classic.

The first track is nothing more than a voice describing the role women can and should play in politics and lasts for nearly one minute before moving onto the powerful, musical opening song, "Fire on Babylon."

"Fire on Babylon" is full of guitar, bass, drums, and is loud, heavy and very musical. From this potent first song, the album moves quietly but meaningfully into the next track entitled "John I Love You," which is a sweet, melodious ballad comprised of piano, acoustic guitar and a cello. Another track called "My Darling Child" is a generous mix of piano, strings, and is accompanied by the Irish Chamber Orchestra. It is a soft lullaby with a waltz-like quality to it when the strings and piano mix ever so gently.

Probably the most interesting "song" on this album is "Am I a Human," which is a child's voice singing the following lyrics without a definite tune: "Am I human/It's very good/Maybe I am/It's very nice/The feelings in me/And the fire/Keeps me warm." Strange, yet poignant.

Unfortunately, O'Connor attempted to re-create "All Apologies," composed by the late Kurt Cobain.

Her vocals are accompanied only by a guitar. This version is lacking in feeling and musical quality.

O'Connor should not have attempted to re-do this song. It is a shame, and an insult to the memory of Kurt Cobain.

One of my favorite songs on the album is "A Perfect Indian" which is a beautiful mix of vocals and piano with incredible lyrics mixed in. The fourth verse is as follows: "I'm sailing on this terrible ocean/I've come for myself to retrieve/Too long have I been feeling like Lir's children/And there's only one way to be free." The next track is somewhat similar to this one and becomes monotonous to listen to.

An example of the feeling and message intermixed on this album is in the song "All Babies." The background music is piano and guitar and the lyrics describe the sad state of the world that babies are born into.

The song begins with "All babies are flown from the universe/from there they're lifted by the hands of angels/God gives them stars to use as ladders." From there it describes the pain and anguish and lack of belief of children.

"In This Heart" is solely made up of vocals in which the first verse is only O'Connor's voice and with each verse until the last, one more voice is added to harmonize.

My all-time favorite song on this album is the thirteenth song entitled "Famine."

This is not really a song, but a message, spoken by O'Connor about the struggles of Ireland, the lack of history and heritage and the controlling of their education by outsiders.

This song has a powerful message and is also very musical. It is very upbeat despite its desolate message and it contributes to the variety of musical styles on this album.

Universal Mother has a few too many messages to decipher a single one.

It has a lot of good things to say, but trying to decipher O'Connor's message can take away from the musical value of the album. I think this is a good addition to anyone's music library.

It is interesting, diverse and creative.

This album is a wonderful effort by Sinéad O'Connor, someone with a lot of talent, and someone we haven't heard from in awhile. I think this album was worth the wait, and worth the money.

NIRVANA 'UNPLUGS' MEMORIES FOR FANS

On Nov. 18, the band Nirvana played at Sony Studios in their MTV unplugged session. Today the recording of one of the last moments of Nirvana's existence is out on CD. Nirvana Unplugged in New York is the newest album out by DGC, produced by Nirvana and Scott Litt.

Following the death of vocalist, guitarist and song writer Kurt Cobain the world became desolate of good music. Yet, now that Unplugged in New York is out, the world can experience what many experienced in November. Unplugged in New York includes 14 tracks.

On those tracks are the following songs: "About A Girl," "Come As You Are," "Jesus Doesn't Want Me For A Sunbeam," "The Man Who Sold The World," "Pennyroyal Tea," "Dumb," "Polly," "On A Plain," "Something In The Way," "Plateau," "Oh Me," "Lake Of Fire," "All Apologies," and "Where Did You Sleep Last Night." Three of those songs are covers of the Meat Puppets.

This album is very memorable not only because it is one of the last things that Nirvana did before the suicide of Kurt Cobain, but the sheer feeling of what exactly Nirvana was. This album is an icon in the history of Nirvana.

The album starts out with the crowd cheering and Cobain going into the first song, "About A Girl" off of their first album, Bleach. The best song off of the album would be "Pennyroyal Tea," which is on the In Utero CD. "Pennyroyal Tea" was the song that Kurt Cobain did by himself on the stage. Included in the song is the passion which fueled the fire for Nirvana. During the song, Cobain's voice whispers into the microphone, lost in his own world, "warm milk and laxatives / cherry flavored antacids."

The songs by the Meat Puppets, "Plateau," "Oh Me" and "Lake Of Fire," are sung with pride by Kurt Cobain telling the audience that he likes the Meat Puppets. They are definite additions that add to the power of this album.

Nirvana Unplugged in New York is a very memorable CD. It is a definite must-have for any collection. This album will ignite memories in the people that remember who and what Nirvana was. Nirvana Unplugged in New York can be found on the DGC label and acquired at most record stores.

TO FRIENDS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF IDAHO:

Here is a fact as reported in Idaho Senate Journals, 1993 and 1994:

GARY SCHROEDER VOTED AGAINST FUNDING FOR THE UNIVERSITY OF IDAHO in 1993 (SB 1243) and 1994 (HB 907).

He claims to be "in line for leadership of Senate Education Committee." All legislators are in line for leadership of their respective committees. He would have to wait his turn before leadership would be his. AND, he voted for TERM LIMITS, so his term could expire before his opportunity came for leadership.

'Drinking Games' entertaining

Amy Ridenour
Staff Writer

While it isn't the greatest literary work of the 20th century, for some it can provide hours of, er, entertainment. The book, of course, is The Complete Book of Beer Drinking Games, by Andy Griscom, Ben Rand, and Scott Johnston.

Included in this book is a disclaimer about the dangers of alcohol, and a plea to underage drinkers to disregard any information included other than the disclaimer.

The authors dedicated the book "To our parents, for funding four years of research." On that note, let me explain that this book is extremely humorous and, ahem, informative, even though it lacks in what some would like to call "substance."

There are over fifty different beer-drinking games listed, subdivided by difficulty using the "Boot Factor" method, or how likely one is to toss their cookies after playing the game.

Boot Factor One is the least likely, for the "novice drinker" or "Wimp Roommate," Boot Factor Five being the most likely to "blow chow," and strictly for the experienced drinker.

This book is also kind enough to include a complete glossary of drinking terms, several ways to say "throwing up," several names for beer, foreign terms for "hangover," and also a section on "Beer Game Etiquette," if there truly is such a thing.

Some of the beer games detailed in the "college student's bible" are "Indian Sweat," "Hi, Bob," Zoom, Schwartz, Perfigliano, "Bladder Bust," and "Boot-a-bout."

"Hi, Bob" is a relatively simple game with few rules. This game must be played while watching reruns of The Bob Newhart Show. Players must chug a half of a glass of beer whenever a character says, "Bob," and a full glass whenever a character says, "Hi, Bob." In case anyone was wondering, this game is Boot Factor Two.

The Complete Book Of Beer Drinking Games is from Mustang Publishing and is available for the bargain price of $8.95.

I also forgot to mention that the book comes with its own barf bag attached to the back cover. What a deal!

Keep in mind that this book is strictly for those who are of the legal drinking age, which is twenty-one, in case you didn't know.

St. Croix River no match for Dr. Kinziger

Dave Lewis
Outdoor Editor

In 1984, Mike Kinziger and his partner Jay Thurston used a full moon, a summer solstice, a spring flood, some good luck and near super-human endurance to set a time/distance open canoe record on Wisconsin's St. Croix river.

The source of the St. Croix River is St. Croix Lake in Douglas County, Wis. From there the river takes a southerly course for 177 miles, much of the way forming the border between Wisconsin and Minnesota.

To paddle that distance in the record time of less than two days, the canoeists strained their muscles into the paddle, completing 80,000 strokes each day.

Even if the body is capable of such torture, the mind must be just as finely tuned because one false maneuver in the treacherous rapids could mean not only defeat of the record attempt, but death.

It may seem that mother nature was smiling on the intrepid canoeists, but such wasn't the case on the morning they started down river.

When the alarm clock jolted them awake in their tent trailer on the shore of St. Croix Lake, they were greeted by loud thunder and flashes of lightning. Lightning could prove lethal for boaters crossing a lake during a storm, so precious time was lost waiting it out. It would be an hour, nearly 6 a.m., before the storm broke, permitting the start of the record attempting marathon.

The lightning had stopped but the rain persisted. Both Kinziger and Thurston knew their rain gear would not go unused on this trip. Wet or dry, team work and communication between record seeking paddlers is important. "Canoeists need to acknowledge the strength and direction of the current. You have to trust your skilled partner," said Kinziger.

The flooded river was helpful in some ways because of the speed of the current. The class one rapids were effectively erased by the high water. However, a flooded river is much more dangerous, not only because of the tendency of high water to make difficult rapids more difficult, but also because high water is literally high.

To navigate under bridges, Kinziger and Thurston had to keep low.

Some of the bridges over the St. Croix are low anyway and during that June flood in 1984, there wasn't enough clearance for an upright man in a canoe.

On one occasion because of high water they paddled their canoe down a submerged sidewalk in Stillwater, Minn. No matter what navigation advantages high water allows, Kinziger and Thurston knew that even paddlers as experienced as themselves faced great danger in the standing waves and steep drops caused by the flood. "The same flooding river that would give us our record speed could also be our Waterloo," said Kinziger of the danger.

Meticulous planning went into the record breaking river trip. Every mile of the river had been studied both by personal inspection and by reading topographical maps. Kinziger and Thurston carried these maps in the canoe and referred to them often to ascertain which course was best in dangerous rapids.

The hour lost the morning of the first day was weighing heavily on the canoeists.

The knowledge that capsizing in a rapid would ruin all chance of setting a new record made them weigh each option with regard to risk versus time saved.

Hauling water that splashes into the canoe saps the paddler's energy. Stopping to bail, sponge or dump it out takes time.

Kinziger and Thurston knew the best course was keeping water out of the canoe in the first place. Kinziger said he wishes it was that easy.

The portages were also carefully planned. On one such portage at St.

80 thousand strokes every day.

Planning and paddling, two men working together with body and mind at achieve a common goal. Mike Kinziger and Jay Thurston have set five time / distance records in an open canoe.

Croix and Taylor Falls, the two paddlers made a 1 1/4 mile portage in 20 minutes. "Having previously scouted the portage," said Kinziger, "we knew the best route would be down Main Street in Taylor Falls, Minn."

Half way through the portage, the sidewalk ahead was blocked by passengers unloading from a bus says Kinziger.

Maybe it was the stern expression on the faces of the canoeists, or maybe it was because they were nearly running down the sidewalk, but the crowd parted like the Red Sea did for Moses, letting the men and boat through. "The canoe was briefly put down in the middle of Highway 8.

We changed ends, picked up the canoe and briskly trotted across the highway as the light turned red and traffic approached," said Kinziger.

The last six miles were paddled by moon light. At 11:22 p.m. their canoe nosed up on the beach at Prescott, Wis.

Being in superb condition and knowing which route to take both on land and on the river helped Kinziger and Thurston set the record.

The St. Croix record is only one of five held by Kinziger and Thurston. They also hold these records: 99 miles on the Namekagon River in one day; 184 miles on the Black River in two days; 440 on the Wisconsin River in eight days, three hours and thirteen minutes; and 600 miles on the Yellowstone River in five and one half days.

One hundred and thirty-nine miles of that record breaking trip were paddled in one day.

All of these rivers are used for much more than recreation. The Wisconsin River in particular. It is known as the "hardest working river in the world" because it is saddled by 26 dams.

Paddling the length of these rivers Kinziger has noticed positive changes in water quality.

He says the Wisconsin is considerably cleaner than it was 25 years ago when its water "would remove varnish from a canoe paddle."

Owning a world record is satisfying, but it can't compare with knowing that the St. Croix at least will remain free flowing and natural for all future generations to use and enjoy.

These intrepid adventurers pulled their canoe through the water all day, stopping only to eat and for 5 minutes of rest every hour. Kinziger and Thurston faced rapids and wind all day and mosquitos all night.

Rec club punts, passes and kicks

Dave Lewis
Outdoors Editor

Football flew at the Kibbie Dome Saturday morning as Pass, Kick and Punt contestants put heart, arm and toe into throwing, place-kicking and punting, each one hoping to win Seahawk tickets. Adam Schede, Travis Pool and Jeremy Nielson are going to Seattle.

Second place winners are Ralph Delden, in the 18 and over, Joe Hall in the 15-17 group and Jeremy Spencer in the 12-14 age group.

Third place winners are David Tate in the 18 and over, Owen Hammond in the 15-17 division and Scott Eier in the 12-14 age group.

Parents and other spectators had also hoped to win the raffle prizes donated by sponsors of the event.

The football contest consisted of three events, punting, passing and place kicking.

Accuracy and distance were factors in all events. Each competitor made two attempts at each station and were given the score for the best of the two.

The length of each pass, punt and kick was measured down a target line. Unless the ball hit on the target line, the distance of the miss was subtracted from the length. The winners of each event were usually not always the strongest, accuracy was a factor in deciding the winners in most event.

The winners in each division received two tickets to see the Seattle Seahawks play Joe Montana and the Kansas City Chiefs. Second place winners each received a UI sweatshirt or a windbreaker and a sideline pass to tomorrow's Vandal football game against Northern Iowa. The three third place winners each received a football signed by the entire Vandal team.

Competitors and staff experienced a rare treat before and during the contest. Throwing, kicking and catching a football on the playing surface of the dome is exciting.

It is easy to imagine the cheers of the crowd as you sprint into the real end zone for a fake touch-down.

Big Buck contest proves to be a success

Successful hunters can enter their big buck and/or bull elk in the Big Buck Contest sponsored by two area businesses.

The biggest white tail buck entered will win a free shoulder mount. The biggest bull elk will win $200 off a shoulder mount. A shoulder mount is the traditional animal head on the wall popular with hunters if not their wives.

Kirk's Taxidermy in Moscow and Country Gas Mart of Princeton are co-sponsoring a big buck and bull contest.

It costs nothing to enter the contest. To participate pick up an entry form at the Country Gas Mart in Princeton. Second prize for both deer and elk will be a case of beverage.

"The contest will run until a week after deer season has ended said Kirk Miller, "We want to give everyone time to bring their animals in, probably the contest will run until Dec. 10."

The deer contest will be limited to elk and white tail bucks only. The Boone and Crocket scoring system will be used. Only gross score will be counted. Miller has been a professional taxidermist since 1987 and trained for two years before that. Anyone who doesn't enter the contest but is still interested in having an animal mounted should stop by and see some of the exceptional work he has on display. Kirk's is located at 224 Troy Rd. and is open from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. weekdays.

If you are unable to reach Kirk's during working hours, he has a 24 hour answering service and checks his calls daily.

Tenth Turkey Run Nov. 5

The University of Idaho Campus Recreation Office will sponsor its 10th annual five mile Turkey Run through the Arboretum on Nov. 5 at 9 a.m.

Check-in and late registration will begin at approximately 8 a.m. in the UI Golf Course Clubhouse.

Persons interested in running who missed the early registration deadline of Oct. 28 may register on race-day for $7 without a T-shirt or $14 with one.

The run is divided into six age divisions for both men and women and the event is open to the community. At the conclusion of the run a random drawing will be held for prizes.

For more information, call Campus Rec. at 885-6381.

UI ice hockey wins first two

The University of Idaho Ice Hockey Club won its first two matches of the season last weekend.

Their first win was a 16-8 drubbing of the Associated Colleges of Spokane.

The next day, the UI team won by forfeit.

Next weekend, the club travels to Helena, Mont. to play the University of Montana.

No. 8 NIU yet another tough foe

Andrew Longteig
Sports Editor

Life's not getting any easier for the Vandal football team.

After a disappointing loss to Montana last week, Idaho will celebrate 100 years of football by facing the No. 8 Northern Iowa Panthers (6-2) Saturday in the Kibbie Dome at 1:05 p.m.

"We got to get focused and forget what happened last week and get going what we have to do this week," UI head coach John L. Smith said.

Idaho's loss dropped them three spots in the polls to No. 6.

The last time Idaho (7-1 overall, 4-1 Big Sky) played UNI was in 1992. At that time, the Vandals were ranked second in Division I-AA and the Panthers were No. 1. It was the first time the top two I-AA schools have played during the regular season. UNI won a 27-26 thriller in Cedar Falls, Iowa.

If history holds true, the Vandals have a darn good shot at winning. Idaho has bounced back to post a victory after a defeat eight consecutive times. Since 1982, the Vandals have lost back-to-back games on just three instances.

Going home is always an effective remedy to snap a losing streak, albeit a one-game streak. UI is 4-0 this season at home and have outscored its opponents by an average of 49 to 18.5.

Idaho has also shutout opposing teams in the first quarter at home this year (41-0).

Smith said the Vandals will have to work on the fundamentals like tackling and blocking—essential in the game of football.

He is also worried about

Vandal volleyball pummels NAU in three

The Idaho Vandals took an axe to the Northern Arizona Lumberjacks Thursday night in a 15-13, 15-6, 15-7 Big Sky volleyball road victory.

Bulgarian Tzvetelina Yanchulova, who has suffered from inconsistency lately after a phenomenal early season, turned back the clock with a 15 kill, 3 error performance against a subpar defensive effort from NAU. The performance was good for a .400 hitting night.

Senior outside-hitter Mindy Rice was solid once again, hammering a game high 18 kills against five errors (.382). Rice also contributed 11 digs. Brittany Van Haverbeke added 10 kills to the Idaho cause as the tremendous trio combined for 43 of the Vandals 49 kills.

With a big night Saturday Haverbeke could become just the sixth Idaho player to post 1,000 kills in her career. The 5-foot 11-inch middle blocker needs 21 to reach the mark.

Idaho (23-2, 10-1 BSC) overcame some mediocre play early in game one to post the 15-13 win, but could muster just a .169 hitting effort. In games two and three Idaho was on a higher level than the sun belt school, hitting .400 and .421 respectively.

Northern Arizona 11-12, 3-9 BSC), which dug only 35 balls compared to Idaho's 42, helped out the Vandal cause in the final game committing 10 errors and only eight kills.

The Vandals collected only eight kills in game three, but did not make an error.

The three game sweep was Idaho's 16th in its 25 wins and eighth in league play. Idaho, which is 10-0 at home, upped its road record to 13-2 on the year and picked up its fifth straight win.

A trek north to Ogden is next on the Vandals agenda as they will face Weber State (10-13, 5-6 BSC) Saturday. The Wildcats currently sit fourth in the Big Sky race.

With 23 wins in only 25 matches the Vandals are trying to break Portland State's Big Sky record for best winning percentage in a season.

Idaho has won 92 percent of its matches this fall. The Vikings won 94 percent of their matches 10 years ago.

Bonheadz beat Betas in frisbee

The Boneheadz intramural men's ultimate frisbee team won the championship Tuesday over Beta Theta Pi fraternity, 8-4.

In the women's championship, Second Time Around defeated Gamma Phi Beta sorority, 4-3 in double overtime.

UNI's balanced offense. "They not only run the ball at you, but they keep you honest as far as throwing the football."

However, UNI averages only 20.9 points per game, compared to Idaho's 43.5.

The Panthers' defense, according to Smith, is physical. They are allowing only 16.3 points per contest.

Andre Allen, a 6-foot-2, 215 pound senior linebacker, anchors UNI's defense. Last season the All-American recorded 120 tackles and nine quarterback sacks in being named Defensive Player of the Year of the Gateway Conference.

In order for the Vandal offense to be successful, they have to establish their running game—something they failed to do against Montana.

Senior running back Sherriden May needs 29 yards to surpass the 1,000 yard mark for the third straight year. He would be only the second running back in the history of the Big Sky to accomplish this.

Additionally, wide receiver Kyle Gary is 60 yards shy of 1,000 and is currently tenth at UI for all-time receptions.

Vandal quarterback Eric Hisaw will be vying to rebound from a subpar performance last week. He is third in I-AA in passing efficiency. His backup, Brian Brennan, is sixth in the nation in passing efficiency.

Not only will Hisaw have to rebound, but the secondary as well. They were scorched for 510 yards passing last week by Dave Dickenson, but are facing a less-talented quarterback this week in Brett O'Donnell.

The comparisons between UNI's and UI's program are seemingly endless:

•Both states are interchangeable, meaning many U.S. citizens confuse the two states, i.e. Des Moines, Idaho and Boise, Iowa.

• Both teams play in domes that were built within a year of each other.

•Smith and UNI head coach Terry Allen both began their head coaching careers in 1989. Allen has compiled a 53-17 record whereas Smith is 51-19. Allen sports the best winning percentage of any I-AA team.

•Since 1985, both teams have been ranked in the Sports Network I-AA poll eight times.

Talented Scott has bright future in football

Matt Shifley
Staff

Vandal football fans should start praying each and every day—begging the gridiron gods that all the recruits that visit the University of Idaho campus are like Robert Scott.

Scott is Idaho's third-string quarterback.

He was pursued by Idaho, UNLV, Northern Arizona, and San Diego State. Scott first visited Idaho and the recruiting war between the schools abruptly ended. Scott is now redshirting as a freshman quarterback.

"I chose Idaho for a lot of reasons," said Scott. "First of all, it is a winning program and I love to win, and here it's a family unit, no individuals, everyone here is for each other."

He also expressed that Idaho's coaching staff was a big factor in his decision to come here, but the biggest reason was the Vandal's winning tradition.

Scott, a native of Southern California, had never been to Idaho until his recruiting trip to Moscow. When asked of his first impressions, he elicited a slight chuckle.

"Small town, it was nothing compared to California, very small but the people here are nice and they have treated me good."

Scott said there was a slight culture shock, but he likes it here. The only thing he dislikes is being away from his family because he is very close to them and says they are his backbone.

After Scott determined he was coming to Idaho, he said everyone was very supportive but his friends did tease him a little about coming here, referring to Idaho as the

"potato state."

He was the first person from his graduating class to receive a scholarship. However, it was in a sport that he really did not count on getting him to college.

He was relying on basketball, not football, to get him to a university. Scott never played high school football until his senior year.

"I based my life basically on basketball to go to college, and I just tried football my senior year and I guess I just got lucky."

He decided to go out for football just for fun and he had such a good time that he earned the starting quarterback position. He achieved league honorable mention honors and led his team to the state semifinals. Scott, besides his duties at quarterback, also played defensive back.

Since he is redshirting, Scott admitted he is having a hard time just watching the games and not being able to play.

"It's real tough especially when you like to play, I'm very competitive so it is hard for me to just sit there, but I am glad we're winning because that makes it a little bit easier, but it is still hard."

To help keep his mind off playing, Scott says he just keeps the faith because he knows next year he may be playing.

"I stay pretty tight with God because my mom raised me that way and He keeps me going," Scott said.

Right now, he is just waiting for his turn and continuing to work hard to get some recognition on the practice field.

His teammates have noticed him by comparing him to a young Randall Cunningham because of his rifle-like arm and scrambling abilities.

Next season may seem it will never get here for Scott, but he is making the most out of his situation by getting ready for next year and setting goals. "I want the head position, freshman or not, that is what I am reaching for," said Scott.
