Area pets need committed owners

As summer quickly approaches, many students leaving town are faced with the dilemma of finding an adequate home for the pet they must leave behind.

Yvonne Herman, president of the Companion Animal Aid and Placement Society (CAAPS), said there is a major problem with abandoned pets in the Pullman-Moscow area.

"Many people put their pets in the car and drive them 20 or 30 miles away and dump them near a farm and hope the farmers will adopt them," said Herman. "But many times when this happens we get phone calls from farmers saying that if we don't come pick up the animal they will shoot it. And many times we try to catch these animals, but we can't because they are frightened."

CAAPS adopts stray and homeless animals and keeps the animals until homes can be found for them. They also put pets without homes into foster homes until adequate homes can be found. They advertise a pet of the week, in regional newspapers and radio stations as a way to let people know about the pets.

"We interview families carefully to match the people with the right pet," said Herman. "It's pretty successful, and pets can be returned if they don't fit with the family."

Herman said CAAPS adopts four animals per week. Beginning in April, CAAPS sees a three fold increase in the number of animals needing homes.

"To give you an example, of how busy we have become," said Herman, "on Sunday we got 20 phone calls, mostly from the Pullman and Moscow area."

Herman said she would like to see people change the concept of "getting rid of" an

Search for college dean nearing end

College of Forest, Wildlife and Range Sciences narrows choice to four

Russ Wright

Staff

The end is near. University of Idaho officials will soon be announcing who the next dean of the College of Forest, Wildlife and Range Sciences will be.

A search committee handed over four names it recommended for further evaluation. John Hunt, Charles Hatch and David Bryant have already completed the grueling schedule of interviews with UI President Elisabeth Zinser, students, faculty, department chairs, college deans and with UI staff in Boise. James Lassoie is scheduled for the round of interviews early next week.

Students, faculty and staff can still bring in written comments regarding the three candidates who have already interviewed, said Claire Shumaker, secretary for Provost John Yost.

Two of the candidates are already employed by UI, and the other two are currently employed by other universities.

John Hunt has been the head of the UI Resource Recreation and Tourism department since 1991. Hunt has worked for George Washington University and Utah State University where he served as an assistant dean. A UI alumnus, Hunt went on to earn his Ph.D. from Colorado State University.

Charles Hatch is the current associate dean for research and is also the director of the International Program for the College of Forest, Wildlife and Range Sciences. He has worked for Southern Illinois University, the University of Minnesota—where he earned his doctoral degree—and Oregon State University.

David Bryant traveled last week from South Dakota State University where he is the dean of the College of Agriculture and Biological Sciences. He has worked for UI before as the head of the Range Resources Department. He has also worked for Humboldt State University and the University of Arizona where he received his Ph.D.

James Lassoie will be traveling from Cornell University where he is a professor of natural resources. Lassoie earned his Ph.D. from the University of Washington where he also served as visiting professor and spent time as a department chair for Cornell. He worked for some time as research assistant for the Weyerhaeuser Research Center and as an insect inspector for Washington state's Department of Natural Resources.

Faculty to receive surprise pay raises next year

Faculty members will receive an unexpected increase of more than 5.4 percent in the pool that provides salary equity and merit raises thanks in part to a plan to shift money intended to increase administrative salaries to faculty salaries.

A Hay Group study commissioned by the Idaho Board of Education found that faculty salary levels at UI are 16.8 percent below their counterparts' at comparable institutions in the West.

The Idaho legislature did not address to the salary disparities identified in the study.

"Our outstanding and dedicated faculty are central to the quality of instruction and advisement to students, the creation of new knowledge as the 'engine' of our economy and cultural enlightenment, and the expert service needed by constituent businesses, agencies and communities," said UI President Elisabeth A. Zinser in a prepared statement.

Under the new plan, money previously slotted for mostly upper administrator salary increases will be redirected to a pool of money available to increase faculty salaries.

Zinser said upper level non-faculty exempt employees and senior academic administrators will share in the three percent merit salary increase pool, while other non-faculty exempt employees at mid-level or lower will share a 4.7 percent pool.

She said that will provide a 5.27 percent pool for salary equity and merit increases for faculty.

Other institutional funds will help provide additional salary increases to create a total faculty salary pool of greater than 5.4 percent.

Zinser said the plan to shift resources was in response to the need to raise faculty salaries.

"The work of faculty requires considerable time investments and continuous advancements in modern approaches to their multifaceted roles. Faculty leaders around our state are collaborating to enhance public understanding of their roles and contributions as well as low salary levels which threaten Idaho's capacity to recruit, retain, develop and reward one of its most valuable human resources—its college teacher-scholars who prepare our future generations of graduates and bodies of knowledge and innovation," she said.

Commencement speaker announced

The University of Idaho graduates will be audience for commencement speaker Dr. Roy Schwarz, a physician, Idaho native and one of the founders of the Washington-Alaska-Montana-Idaho medical education program.

Schwarz, who was born and grew up in American Falls, currently is group vice president of scientific, educational and practice parameters of the American Medical Association. He also serves as an adjunct professor at the University of Illinois College of Medicine; and a clinical professor at University of California at San Diego School of Medicine. He previously served in many capacities at UW, and as dean of the University of Colorado School of Medicine.

Schwarz was one of the founders of the WAMI medical education program, which has set standards for regional medical education nationwide. He was the first director of the Regional Medical Program for the four states, and helped establish the university phase of the WAMI program at UI with 10 students. A short time later, community clinical units were developed at Boise and Pocatello.

Schwarz graduated magna cum laude with a bachelor's degree from Pacific Lutheran University and with honors with his medical degree from UW School of Medicine where he was named Outstanding Graduate. He will be granted an honorary Doctor of Science degree from the UI at commencement, held on Saturday May 20.

New dump site open for use by general public

A new wood waste dump site is open at the University of Idaho fuel site behind the Best Western Inn on Farm Road, Moscow.

The UI Idaho Power Plant is operating the dump site and welcomes all area residents to use the facility, which opened April 3.

Each time the wood waste dump site collects 150-200 pounds, the UI Power Plant can grind it for use as fuel. The plant uses approximately 20,000 tons of ground wood waste products each year.

Paul Brown, UI Power Plant manager, said the plant will not make a profit from the extra materials. The plant will be getting fuel at the same cost while providing a good community service.

The site will accept untreated wood waste materials including lumber, trees, pallets, posts, wood shingles, construction wood waste and tree and shrub trimmings.

Materials that are not composed of wood will not be accepted. The facility warns against dumping asphalt roofing, carpet, sheet rock, tires, concrete, paper or plastic.

A $10 charge will be imposed for every unacceptable item unless they are sorted out and taken back by the person making the bogus delivery.

Household loads of less than 200 pounds will be accepted at no charge, but beyond that, a tipping fee of $25 per ton will be charged. Dump loads can be weighed for free on the scales which are available at the site.

The site will operate weekdays, but use on Saturdays can be arranged by appointment by calling Brown at 885-6271.

MPD charges student with grand theft

The preliminary hearing of a University of Idaho student accused of stealing $2,500 from the UI bookstore is scheduled for Thursday.

Stuart W. Robb has been charged with felony grand theft. The hearing will determine if there is enough evidence to try Robb in district court.

Robb, a history major, is accused of stealing $2,500 from the UI bookstore safe while working there as a janitor.

The theft was discovered by the manager on Feb. 27 when he counted the safe and found it was missing $2,500. The manager had previously counted the money in the safe ten days earlier.

Robb, if convicted, could spend a maximum of 14 years in jail. His hearing is scheduled for 8 a.m. Thursday.

Fraternity bash turns to riot

OSHKOSH, Wis.—When police broke up a fraternity party at the University of Wisconsin-Oshkosh, they probably assumed they wouldn't be seeing any more action later that night.

Police went to the Sigma Pi house around 11 p.m. April 27, and began loading underage drinkers into buses that would take them to the police station for processing. When it was finished, police had issued citations to more than 160 students. But the excitement wasn't over yet.

Less than an hour after the students went home, police were called to downtown Oshkosh to break up a crowd of students.

After their impromptu trip to the police station, some of the students—most of them freshmen and sophomores—returned to their dormitory rooms in Scott Hall. Soon after, someone pulled a fire alarm at the residence hall, and as the students were milling around outside, Oshkosh police say that some of the students who had been cited for drinking earlier that night probably suggested the march in protest of the police business as they marched.

More than 1,000 students converged on the streets of downtown Oshkosh, many breaking windows of about 20 businesses as they marched.

Argentine Catholics pressed to end silence

BUENOS AIRES—Catholic Church officials, in this country, are forced to review their relationship with the Argentine military that killed more than 9,000 people during the 1970s and early '80s.

As Argentina's "dirty war" against suspected leftists escalated, victims of the repression turned to the Roman Catholic Church, if not out of devotion or for spiritual consolation then out of knowledge that cardinals and bishops held great sway with military commanders.

"We had so much hope that the church would help us," said Evel Petri, who has been looking for her 21-year-old-son who disappeared between 1976 and 1983.

About 1,500 people gathered last week to mark the 18th anniversary of the Mothers of the Plaza de Mayo, whose Thursday vigils are a tribute to the memory of more than 9,000 people.

In two other Latin nations that suffered brutal human rights abuses at the hands of a military regime, Chile and Brazil, the church and its clerics were identified as brave opponents of repression. In Argentina, by contrast, the church was widely seen as a staunch supporter of the government.

Forced to face the grim events that occurred just over a decade ago and in some cases implicated cardinals and bishops, the church will judge how it behaved when "the forces of evil were unchained," as Cardinal Pio Laghi, the former papal nuncio here, recently said.

Announcements

Dance Team washes cars for bucks

The UI Dance Team will be holding a car wash on May 13 and 14 from noon to 4 p.m. in front of Hardee's. The money raised from the car wash will go to buying new uniforms and paying for the team members to go to camp. For more information call Kim Holbrook at 885-6668.

Electrical Engineering holds awards banquet

The Idaho Electrical Engineering Department is having their end-of-the-year Awards Banquet in the Washington-Idaho Room at the University Inn tonight. The social hour will start at 6 p.m. with dinner at 6:30 p.m. The awards presentation will follow at 7:30 p.m.

YWCA holds thrift store grand opening

The YWCA of the Palouse will hold the Grand Opening of Y's Buys Thrift Store, located at 110 S. Jackson St. next door to United Church of Moscow, next Friday. The ribbon cutting ceremony will take place at 3 p.m. Refreshments will be served and certificates of appreciation will be awarded to the many contributors and volunteers who donated materials, labor and the financial resources to make the new facility a reality.

Y's Buys will specialize in selling quality used clothing, children's items and household goods. Store hours will be 2:30 to 6:30 p.m. on Tuesday and Wednesday and 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. on Thursday, Friday and Saturday. All sales proceeds will support the operations of the YWCA of the Palouse, including the Sojourner Truth House and the Food and Clothing Bank in Troy.

For more information call 883-3438.

Last chance to help save the environment for this semester

The last ENVI meeting of spring 95 will be held at 6 p.m. in the Student Union Vandal Lounge tomorrow. Elections will be held for two co-presidents, one vice president and one advertising representative. No previous experience is necessary. ENVI would also like to thank all of those people who helped with the successful environmental demonstrations at the elementary schools. For more information call Marya at 882-7912.

Career Services helps prepare for real world

The UI Career Services Center is offering the following workshops this week: "The Job Search" today at 2:30 p.m.; tomorrow at 3:30 p.m. will be "Resumes and Cover Letters"; and on Thursday will be "Interview Preparation" at 3:30 p.m. All workshops are free but pre-registration is recommended. For more information visit Career Services in Brink Hall or call 885-6121.

International Assoc. to hold final event

The Students' International Association will hold their last event of the semester in a Volleyball and Ice Cream Social from 4:30 p.m. to 6:30 p.m. on Friday. The event will take place in the sand courts behind Wallace Complex. The social is free and open to anyone who is interested.

Women's Center journeys into wilderness

The Women's Center will host the "Sacred Circle: A Documentary Cohosted by Bev Doolittle and Marcellus Bear Heart Williams" today at 12:30 p.m. The program is a video presentation taking the viewer on a journey through Yellowstone to the western Great Lakes and to the eagle sanctuaries of the colonial South. The Women's Center will also present "Telling Our Stories and End of the Year Finger Food Potluck" tomorrow also at 12:30 p.m. Both programs will be held in the Women's Center Lounge unless otherwise indicated.

CLARIFICATION

In the story "Forum addresses faculty, staff concerns" of the May 5 issue of the Argonaut the meeting with UI President Elisabeth A. Zinser was not aimed at both faculty and staff. It was the first meeting ever with staff only.

Oops...Tuition's on us

BOSTON—After falsely accusing a Boston high school student of phoning in a bomb threat to a local hospital, the New York telephone company is offering to pay for the student's college tuition.

Less than 12 hours after the bombing in Oklahoma City, a Boston 911 operator reported receiving a telephone call warning that a bomb would explode in 12 hours at Boston City Hospital.

After tracking the call through NYNEX, Boston's phone service provider, police quickly arrested 18-year-old Walter Ray Hill, a junior at Cathedral High School, in connection with the case. Police were given Hill's address by a NYNEX employee, who told them the phone call was traced to a number at Hill's residence.

When police went to Hill's apartment complex, they talked to two women who said they heard Hill speaking on a portable phone the previous night, a few minutes after midnight. This coincided with the time of the bomb threat, and police returned with a warrant for Hill's arrest the next morning.

Hill, who maintained his innocence throughout his arrest, spent two days in prison. His arrest was publicized throughout the city and touted by both Boston's mayor and police chief as an example of how serious the city would treat those who made bomb threats.

NYNEX officials later realized an employee had made an error during the call tracing and had given the wrong address. They told police, who said they arrested the wrong man. Hill was then released from prison. To make up for their mistake, NYNEX has offered to pay for all of Hill's college education.

Police say the original call containing the bomb threat can no longer be traced.

Japanese economy poised to surpass U.S.

TOKYO—On April 19 the economy of Japan came within an eyelash of surpassing that of the United States.

That day the yen soared to 79.75 to the dollar, driving Japan's gross domestic product in inflation-adjusted terms to within two-tenths of a percentage point of equaling the value of all goods and services produced in the United States.

Should the yen gain in value to reach 69 to the dollar—a level that some predict is a matter of months away—Japan's GDP would match the United States' at $6.74 trillion.

In 1985 one dollar was worth 240 yen and the Japanese economy was a third the size of the United States'. But at the 83.95 yen-to-the-dollar rate that prevailed Friday on the New York Foreign Exchange, Japan's 1994 GDP was 83 percent of America's nominal terms.

"The very idea that the economy of Japan, with half the population and one twenty-fifth the land of the United States, could stand shoulder to shoulder with America's (economy) is preposterous," said Shizuo Kamijo, manager of the equities department of Sanyo Securities. He issued the comparison in a report he issued to Sanyo's customers to emphasize his view that the yen is grossly overvalued.

Many American economists agree that the yen's appreciation has bloated the statistical size of the Japanese economy far beyond its real strength.

Perch owner finds making money tough, friends easy

Melica Johnson

Walt Lokteff, 52, is the owner of the Perch convenience store on campus, which many students frequent to get their studying snacks and beverages.

Lokteff finds it difficult to compete with other big businesses when it comes to low prices and advertising costs.

"Compared to big business, our buying power is virtually nil compared to theirs," Lokteff said. "Ad costs are as big for me as a big store."

Lokteff, who has to generate 12 months of business in 9 months of school, finds it very difficult to do. "This summer, I'm going to do some logging to make ends meet," Lokteff said, who also owns a small farm which helps him bring in some extra income.

Lokteff, however, finds that the advantages of owning and running the Perch out-weigh the disadvantages.

"I have a very personal relationship with my customers. You really can't put a price tag on that," Lokteff said. "If I didn't enjoy this I wouldn't be doing it."

Our recent experience that Lokteff had, which left him "crying like a baby," was when the Vandaleers came in and serenaded him. They were showing their appreciation for the lunch he donates every year to them when they go on tour.

Lokteff has owned the Perch for four years and said that he has no idea how long the actual business has been operating.

"My logo says established long ago. I have no idea. A man who graduated in 1948 remembered it," Lokteff said.

"People met each other here, dated and now have kids going here."

The Perch is popular with students because of its close proximity to campus. The store has been owned by Walt Lokteff for the past four years but has been a permanent fixture at UI for over 45 years.

Moscow in '84 from Sacramento, Calif. He sold a jewelry store in Sacramento and opened one in Moscow. When he sold the building which housed the jewelry store, he bought the Perch.

Lokteff, whose native language is not English, was raised speaking Russian.

His parents were originally from Russia. They immigrated to America in 1950.

animal. "If people have to find a new home for their pet, they should let us know as soon as possible," she said. "People should know by March if they can keep their pets for the summer. They should give us as much time as possible to find a home for the pet. And it's as simple as a phone call."

CAAPS is supported by their membership dues, donations, and fund-raisers, and the fees for adopting a pet. "What we charge for adopting a pet does not cover our investment," said Herman. "When we get an animal, we will vaccinate it, neuter or spay the animal and give the new owner a 'dowry' including a traveling case, a blanket, a collar, a leash, a food dish and food."

Herman said there are more pets than available homes. "We adopt pets as far away as Oregon," she said. "We are networking with humane societies around the area so the pet has a better chance to live."

Students object to how activity fees are doled out

Marco Buscaglia

College Press Service

Student Government Association-$4.03
Huskie Entertainment Fund-$2.84
Black Student Union-.37

Although they're not always itemized, fees tacked onto the end of college tuition bills are definitely there, adding anywhere from $50 to $200 to students' tuition bills.

Most of the time, student activity fees are glossed over by students and their parents, who tend to concentrate only on the "total due" when writing out their tuition checks.

But a growing number of students is taking note of how their student activity money is being spent and is refusing to contribute any money toward organizations or causes that they oppose. Instead, they are subtracting the appropriate fees or demanding their money back.

"Students should have a choice in determining where their money goes," said Ron Witteles, editor of the "Northwestern Chronicle," a conservative campus newspaper that sponsored a "Take Back Your Money" day earlier this spring at Northwestern University. "The last thing we want is the administration or a student government bureaucracy deciding where to spend our money."

During "Take Back Your Money" day, Witteles and his staff gave $5 back to the first 100 students who showed up at a campus landmark. The $500 had been allotted by the student government to NU's Conservative Council. But the group chose to hand the money back to students rather than spend it on speakers or other activities.

"No one should be forced to pay for something if they're not going to get any benefits," said Witteles, adding that NU students pay approximately $50 each semester in student activity fees. "It doesn't make any sense. Why should you pay for something you're never going to use?"

Collectively, student activity fees add up to much more than pocket change on many campuses. At the University of Florida, nearly $6 out of every credit hour worth of tuition $6 million in all goes toward student activity fees, which are delegated to various groups by the student government.

But even though the student fees budget is in the millions, a recent survey by the "Independent Florida Alligator," the university's student newspaper, revealed that 90 percent of the UF student body did not know how much they paid in student activity fees each year. Forty-four percent of students couldn't name one item that their money went toward.

"I was pretty surprised when I found out how much money the student government had control of," said Tony Mirando, a UF senior. "When I think about that much money, it just seems like there should be a lot more free stuff for me to do."

A few individual students, however, have objected to paying for activities that violate their personal ideological or political beliefs. At California State University-Long Beach, for example, two students were given a 15-cent refund after complaining that funding for a speech by Khallid Abdul Muhammad, a former Louis Farrakhan aide, was in violation of a California state law.

Long Beach State's Associated Students Judiciary agreed that Muhammad's speech, in which he referred to white students as "crackers," could not be funded by student fees, which, according to California state law, can not be used to advance "political, religious or ideological interests."

Students Steve Negley and Joseph Thinn argued that while it was Long Beach State's Black Student Union who paid Muhammad $3,700 to speak on campus last November, the student group was funded through the university student fees. Negley and Thinn demanded a refund for their share of the $3,700, which amounted to 15 cents each.

Negley said he sought the refund because "the university has to follow the law." "The funding of the speech, which was clearly a hate-speech meant to divide the student body and was an illegal action," he said.

Since the ruling, Negley said that other students have indicated an interest in receiving a refund as well.

In another incident, a Muslim student at the University of Minnesota shorted his tuition payment last year by 26 cents because he did not want to fund a gay and lesbian student organization. The university honored his position and credited his account in full.

Most administrators and students agree that the disbursement of student fees belongs in the hands of the student government. "Decisions on funding for student groups aren't something we need to worry about on a day-to-day basis," said Chuck Loebaka, spokesperson for Northwestern University. "Since these are student groups that request funding, it only makes sense that other students decide their importance."

Chris Tompkins, the former University of Florida student body president, said that funding for various organizations is determined by hearings, discussions and votes.

"It's a democratic process," he said. "We try to weigh the importance of something to the students, both individual and as a whole, and then make the fairest allocations we can."

But David Engelland, a University of Minnesota sophomore, contends that not all groups are treated equally by student governments.

Engelland, president of UM's Students for Family Values, tried unsuccessfully last year to qualify for student funding. After being told his group was "too political," Engelland said he became convinced that he was being mistreated because of the group's conservative agenda.

"We are a non-partisan group, and we welcome anyone who wants to join," Engelland said. "Just because most student groups have a somewhat liberal stance, we stuck out. We needed to make the funding committee realize that student activities are about options."

Engelland spent the next 12 months arguing his group's case. This year, Students for Family Values received $10,000. Although the group had requested $26,000, Engelland said he's pleased. "We'll be able to set up a Rush (Limbaugh) Room for people to come and listen a couple days a week, we'll host debates, and we'll try to sponsor different activities," he said. "It also gives us a chance to set up some fund-raising efforts."

Like Engelland, other students have complained that they've been excluded from receiving funds because of the ideological content of their projects. At least one group of students has taken their case to court.

The U.S. Supreme Court will rule this summer on whether the University of Virginia can provide funding to student groups with BSU Engineering at UI?

Chris Miller

Apparently the UI-BSU engineering issue isn't over. The letters "BSU," are found on the south side of the new UI engineering building on Ash and Sixth streets, author unknown. Is this a political statement, or an obscure construction code for "cover this area with bricks?" The letters will eventually be covered with bricks, so the physical damage is minimal. Perhaps Micron has gotten their local control after all....

Stanford brews its own blend of 'Cardinal Coffee'

Wendi Williams
College Press Service

PALO ALTO, Calif.—When Stanford University students buy coffee these days, they ask for it not only by flavor but by name—the names of their dorms, that is.

Students, as well as faculty and staff, can go into the school's store and buy 11 flavors of gourmet Cardinal Coffee. There's everything from Florence Moore French Vienna to Escondido Sumatra. The most popular is Lacunita Mocha Java.

The university first ordered its specially roasted beans last December after it noticed that students were going off campus to get their caffeine buzz. So when the campus store conducted a survey about what students wanted in their beans, the response was overwhelming.

"They wanted better coffee, a whole bean program. They cared about freshness and flavor," said Jane Williams, marketing manager for Stanford University's Central Stores.

"We found that coffee is no longer a casual beverage. Students are passionate about their java."

Since the Cardinal flavors premiered before the winter break, the store's been selling 748 pounds a month. Because the school is a nonprofit group, it's only available to those attending or working for the university—crushing news to the hundreds of alumni who have called Williams begging for a bag of beans bearing the name of their freshman halls or dorms where they first fell in love.

When a Stanford professor, now in his 80s, came in and asked for a dozen bags of Branner French Roast, though, it was no problem.

He wanted to give it as a gift when he proposed to a woman he met in that hall when they were both freshmen.

"We made him up a very nice gift basket with ribbons and confetti," Williams said. They also tucked in a grinder with a Cardinal emblem on the front; it comes free with any purchase of six or more bags.

Faculty and alumni tend to select beans for sentimental reasons; students, on the other hands, go for flavor, Williams said.

But, now students are asking, what's a cup of coffee without something to dip into it? Stanford students have asked persistently for biscotti, said Williams said, who says she's looking into it. She's also considering stocking Cardinal mugs, warmers, even party mix.

Williams said she expects that the store soon would order additional flavors, all named for campus buildings.

And even though students tend not to be dorm-loyal drinkers, it hasn't stopped them from requesting that the next flavor of Cardinal Coffee be named for their freshman hall.

Sandals: How we celebrate and liberate the foot

Benjamin Forgey
The Washington Post

Sandals: the simplest shoes and surely the oldest. They have been found in ancient Chinese tombs. They are pictured in elegant Minoan murals. The tough Roman legions used them by the thousands. Christian hermits wore sandals, along with hair shirts, when they headed for the desert.

These are the equalizing shoes. Everybody wears sandals. Japanese street cleaners, aristocratic geishas; Greek fishermen, titans on their yachts. For relaxation, Americans love sandals they embody practicality and convenience, two qualities we take to strongly.

Symbolically, sandals confirm our image of ourselves as likable easygoing, informal. We unconfine our toes not only for comfort, but also because we want to look comfortable, to signal something with our feet: Hey, come on over, hang out, be cool, chill. Don't stand on ceremony. Stand on next to nothing—a sole and a couple of straps.

Until recently this emphasis on informality has tended to limit the choices, especially for men. In Europe it's not unusual to see a man dressed in a tasteful suit with sandals to match it's amazing how a handsome sock can raise a sandal's status to that of a full-grown shoe.

By contrast, in the United States men's sandals are usually built for barbecue or beach, not boulevard. This is reflected in the popularity of ergonomic models they fairly shout their comfortability. But pretty they are not. By making such a show of sacrificing beauty for utility, they seem almost to insist that ugly is good for you.

Yet sandals at their best for men as well as women are comfortable and comely. Elegant, even. The beauty of the shoe is its hedonism. Construction can be simple or quite complex, but the point always is to celebrate—as well as liberate—the foot.

Surprise your folks.

Don't forget to ask for really expensive graduation gifts

The Daily Texan
University of Texas

If you are lucky, a lot of people are asking you, "What do you want for graduation?"

Don't be afraid to tell them. If you don't offer suggestions, you are going to get strange kitchenware items that you will never use.

A couple of things you will need for a jump on the real world are:

1. A leather organizer: This will come in handy for scheduling all of those job interviews. It will also keep you organized so you don't forget any of those interviews. Plus it looks cool.

2. A briefcase: A soft leather briefcase adds the finishing touches to the whole "I-am-a-business-person" look or to the whole "I-want-to-be-a-business-person" look.

3. A suit: No one wants a suit—specially as a graduation gift. But one good suit can sit through many interviews.

Just make sure you dry clean it in between interviews. You really can sweat in those things.

4. A watch: If you don't have one, you need one. Showing up late for an interview is very bad. Maybe you should ask for a watch with an alarm.

5. A good pair of running shoes: These will serve two purposes. You can put them on after job interviews, and you'll look just like a yuppie with a job. Your feet also will be saved some pain and agony.

Also you can use them to outrun bill collectors when they come for you.

6. Feel-good tapes: You are a good person, even if it takes you three years to find a job.

Get some affirmation tapes to reaffirm that. You will need them after job interview No. 20.

7. A nice set of pens: Who knows why you need this, but you will get it so you might as well ask for it.

8. A computer: Hey why not? It would come in really handy.

If you had the computer, you could do your own job resume.

9. A new car: As long as you are asking for big stuff, go for the gusto.

If you got a new car, you would never have to worry about breaking down on the highway on the way to interviews.

Don't bother asking for the car if you are moving to New York City. It will get stolen.

Instead, tell your gift buyer that you need thousands of tokens for the subway. You also might want a stun gun and mace.

10. An answering machine: There may come a day when a company wants to call you back.

But don't put some silly message on the machine until you sign the contract.

Washington outlook: Defending civil liberties

Ronald Brownstein
Los Angeles Times

WASHINGTON—Maybe the time has finally arrived for the American Civil Liberties Union to send out that fund-raising letter to the National Review subscription list.

Remember when Ed Meese called the ACLU "the criminal's lobby?" Or when George Bush, doing his best to rattle the ghost of Joseph Welch, labeled Michael S. Dukakis a "card-carrying member of the American Civil Liberties Union?"

File it all. In the aftershock of the Oklahoma City bombing, the right is suddenly teeming with civil libertarians.

In the past two weeks, a parade of Republicans and conservatives have warned against overreacting to the attack with sweeping anti-terrorism legislation that infringes on civil liberties. It's not entirely surprising to hear such arguments from the libertarian Cato Institute. But who would have expected such tender sentiments from dyed-in-the-wool Reaganites such as Bruce Fein, the conservative legal scholar, and Paul Craig Roberts, a charter supply-side economist? Yet both last week penned opinion pieces in the conservative Washington Times warning Congress against going too far.

Then there was the joint plea for moderation from those traditional brothers-in-arms: the ACLU and the National Rifle Association. "History is clear," they wrote, in a statement joined by an assortment of right-leaning groups, "that when the nation has overreacted in moments of crisis, the results have been bad for basic freedoms."

This strange bedfellowing reached its improbable apex when Oliver L. North recently invited onto his radio program Ira Glasser, the ACLU's executive director. As Glasser warned of granting the executive branch too much authority to monitor dissent, the man who once tried to run a secret war from the White House basement "made all kinds of sympathetic noises," the ACLU official recalled.

When North and Glasser are pointing in the same direction, it's time to check the compass.

Two factors are scrambling the political polarity on the terrorism debate.

One is the fall of the Soviet Union. During the Cold War, support for surveillance of domestic dissidents was framed as a measure of commitment to fighting Communism; to doubt J. Edgar Hoover was to strengthen Nikita Khrushchev. That catechism obliterated resistance to the expansion of government police power from conservatives who fought virtually every other increase in federal authority. Because liberals were more likely to question the nature and breadth of the Communist threat abroad, they were also more inclined to challenge the need for intrusive monitoring of dissent at home.

LIBERTIES • FROM PAGE 8

But now, the collapse of the Soviet threat has taken down with it the last pillar of conservative support for big government, and even federal law enforcement is no longer immune to a widening Republican critique of Washington. "Polls show about 40 percent of the people are afraid of their government and with good reason," says Senate Judiciary Committee chairman Orrin G. Hatch, R-Utah. "Government has become the oppressor."

That shift is apparent in the surprising extent to which conservatives—even after the Oklahoma City bombing—are maintaining a steady drumbeat of criticism against the government's handling of the siege at the Branch Davidian complex in Waco, Texas, in 1993 and the performance more generally of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, the agency charged with enforcing federal gun laws. Even liberal charges that such attacks encourage conspiracy theories among far-right groups, such as the militia movement linked to the Oklahoma attack, haven't stilled the conservative chorus. Says Hatch: "I agree with a lot of these organizations that worry there will be a lot more Wacos."

The focus on the ATF and Waco underscores the second, and largest, reason for the upsurge in conservative concern about reining in government gumshoes: the nature of the targets. With such rare exceptions as the Ku Klux Klan, government surveillance in this century has focused primarily on agitators of the left: Communists and socialists in the McCarthy era, the New Left and civil rights groups in the 1960s. That was another reason liberals were more skeptical than conservatives about handing Hoover a blank check.

Now as the focus shifts to groups on the right, conservative politicians are experiencing the same anxieties. At a House Judiciary Committee hearing last week on the administration's anti-terrorism package, freshman Rep. Bob Barr, R-Ga., practically jumped out of his chair when Deputy Attorney General Jamie S. Gorelick suggested that militant tax resisters were one of the groups that could receive increased scrutiny under the administration's new approach. Looming even larger are the fears of gun-owner groups that their members could become the targets of heightened government surveillance as the spotlight shines on the shadowy militia movement. "My concern is that they will go after people who own guns just because they own guns," says Tanya Metaksa, the NRA's chief lobbyist. Republicans can no more ignore those sentiments than a pistol in the small of their back: Gun owners cast fully 35 percent of the votes for GOP congressional candidates in last fall's mid-term electoral sweep.

This cross-pressure from liberals still concerned about civil liberties and conservatives newly enlisted to the cause is having a healthy effect as Congress considers its legislative response to Oklahoma City. The pressures have interrupted the reflexive pattern of Republicans looking to toughen whatever law enforcement proposal President Clinton puts forth.

The cautionary notes from Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., among others, made it easier for the administration to reach the sensible conclusion of not significantly loosening FBI guidelines limiting the surveillance and infiltration of domestic groups.

And the anti-terrorism legislation introduced by Dole and Hatch strikes roughly the same reasonable balance as Clinton's proposals; in some instances the GOP bill was even more mindful of civil liberties than Clinton's. Civil libertarians still have some justifiable quarrels with aspects of both versions, but less than they feared, and the trend in Congress clearly is toward moderation.

In some areas, Congress may be treading too cautiously. Defending civil liberties doesn't mean ignoring the threat to civil order. Yet congressional Republicans, hearing the signals from the right, are daily growing more reluctant to express any concern over the militia movement.

The House Judiciary Committee has agreed to hold hearings as soon as next month on Waco and other allegations of government abuse, but hasn't yet decided whether to look at the militia movement, as Democrats have urged. In the Senate, Hatch says he's "not inclined to get into that unless there is a tie-in (to the bombing) established."

There are, Hatch says, "a lot of sincere people in those militia movements." That may be. But the evidence also suggests the movement encompasses considerably less benign elements. It isn't fair to characterize all of these weekend warriors as threats to the nation's security. But the Los Angeles Times and other sources have documented numerous examples of threats to government employees from these radically disaffected groups.

In debates over crime, Republicans have long accused Democrats of sublimating protection of the law-abiding to their concerns about the civil liberties of the accused. As the nation explores the risks of home-grown terrorism with roots on the right, Republicans should be careful not to fall down the same well.

Holding hearings on alleged government abuses of gun owners without looking at the risks flowing in the other direction would hardly send the strong signal of congressional support for vigilance that FBI director Louis J. Freeh requested at last week's hearings. Protecting civil liberties shouldn't become an excuse for just protecting favored constituencies.

Academics meet, test ideas at cybersalons

College Press Service

MADISON, Wis.—Call it salons of cyberspace.

But as academics become more specialized and are separated from colleagues by miles, they are using the Internet to test ideas and revive an intellectual intimacy practiced by 19th-century artists and intellectuals.

That's what University of Wisconsin anthropologist Andrew Petto found after studying three Internet discussion groups with more than 2,000 subscribers, both academics and laymen with interests in anthropology.

After four years of observing the groups and talking with people involved, Petto concluded that the Internet has become academics' version of the Algonquin Roundtable. "People are sharing important ideas that may not yet be fully formed. They're subjecting themselves to criticism," he said. "They're developing open and trusting relationships."

All this posting and sharing of information has not only resurrected what some considered to be a lost art of communication, but also may be changing the way academics work.

"Twenty years ago, professors and researchers attended lectures to hear the latest research and that interaction is now shifting to the 'Net,'" Petto said. "People sharing research and ideas is happening all the time instead of just a annual conferences. Now there are ideas floating around that would never see the light of day at a lecture."

By posting research papers and hypotheses to discussion groups with dozens, or even hundreds, of members, Petto said he and his colleagues often get unexpected responses that give fresh insights to problems. Even posting messages to the wrong groups has turned up "some very interesting responses."

"If you're open to that kind of thing, it can be good," Petto said. "It's a more democratic sort of peer review."

The intellectual exchange, Petto reported, is most important to those isolated in smaller departments or schools where they have few colleagues or professional contacts in their fields. They use the Internet like "an invisible college," as one respondent put it, to write and review papers and grants, and to request and make suggestions for teaching, bibliographies or job openings.

Even though the Internet makes communicating easy and has opened up discussion of ideas and issues that may have remained buried, the academics realize the more time they spend online, the more physically isolated they become. And most of those polled also want to put a human face—or at least a voice, by telephone—to the messages and documents that scroll across their screens.

religious affiliations. The decision will set a precedent for state universities and governmental institutions across the nation.

Four years ago, UV officials denied $5,862 in funding to "Wide Awake," a student-published Christian magazine that focused on social and political issues. Administrators told the student editors they were adhering to a 1970 bylaw that prohibited the use of student activity fees for "religious activities."

Ronald Rosenberger, Gregory Mourad and Robert Prince, the editors of the magazine, cried foul, pointing out that the university funded 118 other student organizations, including the Muslim Student Association and the Jewish Law Students Association, and that the decision to deny funding to "Wide Awake" was one of selective discrimination.

Rosenberger and the other students filed a lawsuit against the university, but lost their original case as well as the subsequent appeal.

When the Supreme Court heard opening statements from both sides earlier this year, Michael W. McConnell, the attorney representing the students, argued that the decision to not fund the magazine was an act of intellectual favoritism. "A university cannot use its power to skew the marketplace of ideas by favoring some viewpoints above others," said McConnell. "It is unfair and illegal."

Attorneys for the university argued that their decision was based on long-standing state and federal policies that separate church and state. They also cited the First Amendment's Establishment Clause, which prohibits the government from providing funding for groups that wish to establish a religion.

"There is a long and honored tradition in this country of financial disengagement between church and state," argued UV law professor John C. Jeffries Jr. "We think it's entirely reasonable to adhere to that position."

But what if a student government doesn't agree with a group's viewpoint or finds it offensive? Is it OK then to withdraw or refuse funding for the group?

When University of Pennsylvania's students activities council voted to rescind funding of a student produced conservative magazine, it unleashed a campus-wide debate about issues of free speech and censorship. The controversy arose when Haitian students strongly objected to a column that appeared in "The Red and Blue." "One Man's Vision of Haiti" by Jeremy Hildreth, read that the "only imports from Haiti we have in this country are exiled dictators and cab drivers" and was coupled with a drawing of a voodoo doll.

The column created such a stir among Haitian students on campus that Penn's Student Activities Council killed $2,000 in funding for the 7,500-circulation magazine and decided to no longer recognize its existence as a student-funded publication.

Christopher Robbins, editor of "The Red and Blue," told the "Philadelphia Daily News" that the council was censoring the magazine. "This is censorship in the worst possible way," Robbins said. "When you cut off the money, you cut off the lifeline."

After complaints from students for and against the magazine, Penn President Judith Rodin stepped in, asking the council to re-examine the decision as not to practice "an assault on free speech." A Penn spokesperson said that after discussion, the council announced that the 106-year-old magazine's funding was not cut off because of the Haiti article, but to make room for new student groups.

Yet the question of how to best disburse student fees remains a matter of debate on many campuses. Both Witteles and Engelland support a "check-off" system, where students decide for themselves what organizations they wish to fund. They point to Stanford University as a model for student fees.

On the Palo Alto campus, students vote each April on budget requests from student organizations.

In order to qualify for funding, groups must get a majority of the vote with at least 15 percent of the student body voting.

"It makes things a little more difficult, but it also gives you a chance to go out to the students and tell them what you want to do," says Jaasi Munanka, chairman of Stanford's Black Student Union. "You get a chance to show them why your group is necessary in the first place."

RENAISSANCE FAIR PROVIDES FUN FOR EVERYONE

East City Park offers tunes, crafts, food for all ages

Jeffrey Albertson

Photos by Antonio Gonzales

Back when velvet oil paintings and lava lamps were the epitome of artistic endeavors a small group of people got together to showcase arts and crafts in Moscow's East City Park.

That event, which started as a minuscule grass roots organization, has grown to cap the boundaries of the park. Now 21 years later the Moscow Renaissance Fair attracts visitors and vendors from all over the Western United States.

With over 200 applications for 135 juried booths and an average of 14,000 visitors per day the Renaissance Fair, despite its surge in popularity over the years, has remained true to its founders intentions.

"This all started as a small group of people doing arts and crafts in the park," Ed Clark, Vice President of the Fair's organizing committee said. "It's still all run by volunteers with no corporate sponsorship."

Vendors are required to pay a fee around $60, Clark said, with that money going to pay for entertainers and publicity.

Last weekend's event kicked off with the nine-piece Border Highlanders Scottish bag pipe ensemble parading around the park. The group proceeded to the main stage giving the audience a listen to several songs before King and Queen of the fair, John and Janet Fiske, welcomed the early afternoon crowd to the festival.

The royal court was dressed accordingly to the Renaissance theme sporting vibrant colors representing the era complete with a crown of jewels.

"It's great to be alive in 1995, who could find a better way to greet the glorious month of May," John Fiske said amidst applause and cheers of long live the king and queen.

With gray skies and a cool breeze threatening five-year old Racheal Draznin-Nagy took the stage to sing Somewhere Over the Rainbow. Minutes later the sun managed to poke through for a brief moment bringing a small but appreciative roar from the crowd, never the less the weather remained overcast throughout the weekend but fairgoers did manage to escape the threat of rain.

Melody and Tim Croft from Santa, Idaho were just one of the many booths offering handmade crafts at the fair. The couple, also dressed accordingly to the theme, were on hand to demonstrate the ancient craft of drop-spinning yarn. The craft, which pre-dates the spinning wheel, can be used to make wool hats, scarves and slippers.

Richard Stanek traveled from Eugene, Ore. to sell his handmade tone drums. Stanek has crafted these little wooden boxes, which emit hi-pitched rhythmic sound, for 15 years.

The idea dates back 1500 years ago originating from the Mayan civilization, Stanek uses African paduk, cherry, mahogany and other recycled woods to create these unique musical instruments.

Those traveling to the fair on bike were offered a free tune up and a free bicycle map of the northwest from Dave Peckham. Peckham said he does a lot to promote bicycle transportation and one way to do that was to keep people's bicycles in good working condition.

Among the various other sights, sounds and smells of the fair were scheduled performances from Dan Maher, The Cantrells, Higher Ground and The Toucans.

The University of Idaho's KUOI was also present, broadcasting the fair's entertainment live throughout the weekend.

Children's activities included mural painting, face painting, story telling, jugglers, and a zip-trip from the Adventure Bound Ropes Course which sent kids racing down a line from one tree to another suspended on a harness 10 feet above the ground.

Tucked away in the northwestern corner of the park food vendors sold everything from nature burgers, baked potatoes, sausage on a stick and cookies as well as cuisine ranging from Chinese, Bolivian, Philippine and Mexican.

In order to cope with the large amount of foot traffic and trash, fair organizers, with the help of Moscow junior and senior high school students, set out buckets throughout the park for people to recycle glass, plastic, cans, Styrofoam cups and food wastes. The idea was to recycle 75 percent of the waste created at the fair.

The enormous success of the fair tends to come from its ability to offer something for everyone.

"Crafts people tell me it's one of their favorite events of the year, Clark said. "I had one vendor tell me that he didn't care if he sold anything because the ambiance is so nice it's just great to be here."

All things combined make it possible for the Moscow Renaissance Fair to be the largest festival of its size in the region to receive no public grant support.

Connolly graces Social Club

Amy Ridenour
Lifestyles Editor

He has been described as "literary, serious, reflective, soulful, eclectic, blues-driven, and occasionally goofy."

His name is Kevin Connolly and he will be performing at the Moscow Social Club tomorrow evening.

On tour just after releasing his third CD, Little Town, Connolly brings with him incredible musical versatility and a powerful performing style.

His vocals change on each song as a sunset gradually fades from pink, to red, to purple. The recipe for his unique sound music is part folk, part rock, with a dash of Van Morrison flavoring.

A native Marshfield, Mass., Connolly is no stranger to the New England folk music scene. He is, in fact, widely recognized as one of the most talented singer/songwriters in Boston. In 1994 he was voted "Best of Boston" by Boston Magazine for folk.

His first exposure to folk music was through his parents, whose musical selections included Bob Dylan, Arlo Guthrie, John Prine, Leadbelly, and Jimmy Rodgers.

After a brief stint as a college football recruit at Dartmouth University, Connolly joined the school's choir, quit football, and has been singing ever since.

Not only is Connolly musically gifted, but he has a keen sense of story in his lyrics. His latest album, Little Town, tells the stories of his childhood and adolescence in Marshfield. It tells of "mental snapshots" of Malibu wagons, fishing rods, Friendly's, and his first love.

Connolly wrote the music and lyrics on this new album. It is a diverse masterpiece of talent.

Each track has a distinct sound and rhythm, and the lyrics gently tell stories of Connolly's youth, simply, yet effectively.

The title track reflects his youth in Marshfield. "The river swells in the summer/ And the rope swings high on a tree/ And the Sullivan boys bang their heads/ On the signs of Lugani Street/ I drove a forklift there every season/ I snuck in late with the sand on my feet/ I fell in love with Kristen Lanzetta/ I always hated the local police."

My favorite song is called "Lucy Falls in Love," and is about his dog named, of course, Lucy. "She's on a mission for a ball/ You say heel but she don't follow/ Then like a catapulting rocket/ She'll rip your arm out of its socket."

"His voice is robust yet comforting, his songs optimistic and insightful," according to the Boston Globe.

The Wenatchee World (as in Wenatchee, Washington) says, "Just Connolly and his guitar and about 20 terrific songs about the dream of living...I was inspired that a person could be that good at something, let alone be that good of a performer."

Connolly will begin performing at 9 p.m. at the Moscow Social Club on tomorrow evening. This is one show you don't want to miss.

LC's Brew Review: a beer smorgasbord

Erik Marone
Staff

As I browsed the beer section of my favorite purveyor of alcohol, I was clueless as to what kind of beers I should cover for the final review of the semester.

I ended up grabbing a bottle of anything that looked interesting, which resulted in a jolly time for me and my friend Brad as we sampled the fine brews you will find reviewed below.

At the suggestion of the always friendly and helpful clerk, I chose the Australian Old Australia Stout.

It is rather weak as stouts go, and is more like a porter in color and body.

The initial taste was light, but finished strong and clean, without the bitter aftertaste that usually accompanies a good stout. It took Brad and I 15 minutes to arrive at a verdict about the bouquet.

It is hopped rather uniquely, producing a sharp, pungent aroma that is almost wine-like in character.

Overall, it is a pleasant beer that departs from the traditional stout style and well worth checking out.

I spied a bottle of Boon Rawd Brewery's Singha Malt Liqueur, something I haven't seen for years, so I decided to try one.

If you have had any American malt liquors, you would be quite prepared for this Thailand brew. It is comparable to many of the supermarket variety malt liquors, but has a sweeter taste, greater body and less of the metallic flavor that seems to typify American malt liquor offerings.

If you are ever in San Francisco, try to visit the Anchor Brewing Company, the home of a number of delightful brews, most notably their trademark Steam Beer.

Steam beer, also known as California Common beer, uses a unique brewing process that produces a light charactered reddish-amber brew.

It has an almost floral bouquet and mildly bitter flavor with a lingering aftertaste that is not at all unpleasant.

Also from the Anchor Brewery comes a porter that is rather unique as well. It is not as dark as some porters, but has outstanding body and flavor.

The Anchor Porter is very smooth brew that is lightly bitter and finishes dry. Most of the hops for this beer went to the bouquet, which is sharp and aromatic. This is truly one of the better domestic porters available.

Finally, we sampled the Belgian Gouden Carolus. This medium-bodied ale has a deep amber color and almost grapy aroma.

With cider-like characteristics, it is too sweet (and too expensive) to be consumed as a thirst-quenching cold one or to accompany pizza or burgers.

However, the Gouden Carolus would make a quite acceptable and tasty desert beverage for any number of fine meals.

If you would like to sample any of these fine beers for yourself, they are available locally at the Wine Company of Moscow.

Why not spend your summer exploring the world of beer? With domestic micros and imports becoming more widely available everywhere you go, a whole new realm of beverages is opening up.

Until next fall, remember that life is too short to drink bad beer. Cheers!

Exploring the world of Central America

Valaree Johnson
Staff

The International Women's Association held its final meeting of the school year with a presentation of "The Worlds of Central America."

Anna Hoare from Belize, Zoila Moncada from Honduras, and Silvia Perez from El Salvador gave the presentation as a farewell to the University of Idaho and IWA following the two years they have been studying in the Resource, Recreation and Tourism Department of the College of Forestry. They are among several Latin American students on the Rocap Scholarship.

The goal of their studies is to be trained for professional promotions of developments in Central America. This summer they return to their homeland to use their skills.

"The experience has taught me to see my country through different eyes," says Hoare, who had never really recognized Belize as part of a region rather than a single country in Central America. "Belize has it all, I just love my country."

Hoare used the opportunity to exhibit the flourishing forests, beautiful skylines, and various wildlife such as the toucan which is the national bird of Belize.

In her slide presentation, Hoare illustrated the cultural diversity of the people in Belize which includes Mayan, Spanish, British, African, and indigenous descent.

Hoare also explored some of the 208 keys incorporating the various coral and tropical fish in Belize. "The world under the water is pretty fascinating," says Hoare in her thick dialect of English which is the primary language of the country.

An overview of Central America was given by Zoila Moncada with a digest of her native country of Honduras. Moncada showed slides of everything from the villages built in hills with dirt roads to the big cities such as Zamarano.

With pictures that looked like paintings, Moncada portrayed the beauty of the many natural resources in Honduras including waterfalls, botanical gardens, and the hieroglyphics found in caves.

"Making handicrafts is relaxing time for my people," said Moncada as she explained the making of colorful clay pots, hats, and other textiles of Honduras.

Silvia Perez gave the contrast of the city life with the beaches in a video about her homeland of El Salvador.

"Many identify my country as an unsettled place. People are always asking me if it is safe," says Perez. "I am proud of my people and want others to know that my country is very visitable."

Perez showed the art and culture of El Salvador as well as its majestic historical past. Perez's video demonstrated the progress the country has made in industry and democracy.

"You're welcome to come any time," says Perez.

The women were happy to share their cultures. Although they are eager to go home, the experiences they have had in Moscow will be hard to bid farewell.

IWA, which is sponsored by the International Programs Office and ASUI has successfully completed its fourth year of service to UI and the community.

Movie Reviews

CANDYMAN II FAREWELL TO THE FLESH

Say his name once and nothing will happen. Say it again, the same. Say it three more times though, and beware of the fifth utterance of the name Candyman. Yes, you guessed it, the story continues of the trials of love and death of the Candyman in Candyman 2: Farewell to the Flesh.

The second movie is by far better than the original cult classic. The movie follows almost on the heels of the first one. Instead of taking place in Chicago, the second movie takes place in New Orleans during the Mardi Gras season.

Unlike the original movie, Farewell to the Flesh is not based on a short story. The first movie was based on the short story "The Forbidden" by Clive Barker. The second movie was written by Barker, who was also the executive director of the film.

Barker brings to screen one of his more vivid characters, next to Pinhead of course, from the Hellraiser series (of which there is going to be a fourth one).

Tony Todd is Candyman, a person who is out for vengeance on those who punished him for loving someone. Farewell to the Flesh puts more depth into the background of the Candyman as well as finishes up the story.

From the mind of horror's master writer and springs forth this new spine-ripping horror film.

It is unlike any other horror film because it was written by a master in the genre as well as done on a substantial budget. It is not just a hack 'n slash film like most horror is. It has a story line to it as well as some meaning.

The Candyman isn't just a psychopathic killer. He is a man of intrigue; a man of love and depth.

But mind you there is still a lot of brutal slayings in this film. It is not for the queasy. It will make you nauseous if you can't take blood.

One of the horror effects that Barker uses in this film is that of lighting. There is a scene in the film where lighting makes you jump just because it offsets you and adds a surreal effect to the place of death.

Farewell to the Flesh also offers a cast of actors who can actually act. Thus, Farewell to the Flesh breaks away from the usual bad acting we find in many horror films.

It's up for grabs which movie is better. I would have to choose this one over the original any time just for the sheer flavor and mouth watering sense it leaves you with. You leave the theatre wanting more of the candy the Candyman can offer.

If you are into horror and are into Clive Barker then don't miss this flick. It will hook you and take you on a ride through the mind and realm of Clive Barker and the Candyman.

Trevett benefit at Beanery

Jeremy Chase
Staff

Music filled the air Friday night at the Beanery Coffeehouse as several acts used an open mike to pay tribute to Jack and Jeff Trevett.

From acoustic solos, duos, and other acts, many people took the stage from 9 p.m. to 11 p.m. to perform.

However, many of the performers were bothered by problems with the small p.a. system before and during the night. After some time adjusting the levels, the microphones and speakers were in working order.

Overall, the performers provided a fine mix of entertainment for the large Beanery crowd.

From the first act to the last, the range of music went from originals rooted in folk and blues to covers.

Artists covered included everything from Simon and Garfunkel, Sinead O'Connor, and Sky Cries Mary.

Also, some performers from Saturday's Renaissance Fair were at the benefit.

The benefit show, coordinated by Peter Basoa, was to gain donations from people to help the Trevett family and their many friends recover.

Jack Trevett, and his son, Jeff, were killed in an automobile accident involving a drunk driver while traveling to Ashland, Ore.

Part of the money made from sales at the Beanery Saturday night went toward a memorial account, along with the money put in a donation jar at the door.

In a previous interview with the Argonaut, Basoa said that Friday's benefit is just the first step in arranging events for the Trevett family.

In the fall, he said that a benefit concert featuring local bands from the area will be held.

In addition, a memorial account at Moscow's Key Bank has been opened for anyone that wishes to donate.

Jack Trevett was the operator of RPM Records in Moscow, an independent music store. Through his business, he knew and befriended many people in the community. Jeff Trevett was a student at Moscow Junior High School.

Any questions about the memorial account at Key Bank can call 882-6504 for more information. Donations can be made any time during the day.

Olsen's fiery, funky, funny 'Surfing Tomorrow'

Helen W. Hill
Staff

I don't usually expect art when reading literary criticisms. But then I always expect some kind of fun when what I'm reading came from Lance Olsen.

The man doesn't use words as bricks to build the walls of a structure so much as bright bits of colored glass to be tenderly laid in a mosaic and welded in place there to a solid sparkle of idea light.

I should have known from the title that the essays he included would be almost as titillating even if they were serious.

How boring could something called Surfing Tomorrow be, even with the subtitle Essays on the Future of American Fiction?

The essay titles are just as promising — "The Last Pterodactyl, or: The Future of American Fiction" by Olsen, "Cleverness Is a Savings and Loan" by Kelly Cherry, "Betrayed" by Lewis Shiner — and don't disappoint.

From Olsen's list of the best of modern American fiction with quick bites of why each is representative or important to Tracy Daugherty's use of the blues song "We didn't care what Momma didn't 'low" as a standard for the questioning, even attacking, of conventional society and traditional forms as the duty as well as passion of each new generation of writers, this book stirs with the surety that literary growth is not destroyed by change but like many plants thrives when put to fire.

Despite the fun, this is a serious critique of the current state of fiction in America.

The conclusion seems to be that despite the mass of schlock produced as popular fiction, new literary trends will spark, flame up and finally die back as they have done for centuries.

For a compelling, enthusiastic, funny look at fiction today and its promise for tomorrow, Surfing is a winner. The cover art by Andi Olsen is intriguing as well. Surfing Tomorrow: Essays on the Future of American Fiction is available for $9.95 (less for multiple copies) plus $1.70 postage and handling directly from Potpourri Publications, P.O. Box 8278, Prairie Village Kan. 66208 or at Book People of Moscow on Main Street.

The national past-time is back or is it

Kevin Neuendorf

It used to be a game where arguments were settled among opposing players and teams on the field, but baseball is now being dictated by the billionaire owners versus the millionaire players both of which have neglected the game of baseball to squabble over luxury taxes, arbitration, free agency, and salary caps.

After a 232-day lay-off, cancellation of the World Series, and the use of replacement players and umpires, baseball's return was a welcome site for many fans across the nation on opening day.

Or was it?

America's pastime is suffering from a public relations nightmare that might not go away anytime soon.

The seemingly worthless player's strike of 1994 solved nothing for either side as owners and players were unable to resolve their conflicts. To this day, there is still no settlement between players and owners but the game continues as if nothing happened. As attendance staggers during the opening month of baseball's return, fans are still uncertain if baseball is back to stay or whether it will be taken from them yet again.

A message is being sent to owners and players alike, that says if you don't care about baseball neither do the fans.

Consider that after the first weekend of play, attendance was down in virtually every ballpark throughout the major leagues.

In the American League, attendance for the first 32 games of the season was only 52 percent of capacity, which is already down 12 percent from 1994's opening weekend.

Attendance at 22 home openers dropped 18.6 percent from last year, despite various ticket discounts and promotions.

Opening day in Cincinnati, summed up the admirations of millions as a plane flew over Riverfront Stadium pulling a banner reading Owners & Players: TO HELL WITH ALL OF YOU.

In the New York Mets home opener, three fans climbed out of the stands and threw 150 one-dollar bills around the infield, and boldly defined the epitome of baseball's demise on their T-shirts as the word greed was emblazoned on their chest.

"Something is missing," expressed Felipe Alou, manager of the small-market Montreal Expos, during the Expos' opening night game in Pittsburgh on April 26. "A weird atmosphere. Coming from a foreign country, I gradually came to understand what baseball meant here, I was sitting there in the middle of the game thinking we really have to straighten out the national pastime."

Something is missing that's for sure. No longer do players play for the love of the game like DiMaggio, Ruth, Aaron, and Rose once did, today's players have been bitten by greed and show little respect to the people who ultimately pay their contracts: We the fans.

The game of baseball will live on through the "year of the strike" just as it has since its beginning.

In time, the fans will come back to the "old ball-game" to root for their favorite teams and perhaps, as if from an act from god, owner and player

Tormey pleased with defense

Phillips

Shelt

Starting quarterback still up in the air

Damon Barkdull

Staff

Before Vandal pigskin Spring drills started, first year Vandal coach Chris Tormey had a riddle to be answered, rather, a puzzle to be put together.

Although some of the pieces are still missing, Tormey and his free agent coaching staff are very close to putting the puzzle together.

Fortunately, Tormey has found some key pieces to his puzzle on defense.

"I was really surprised by our defense. I was especially surprised how well Tim Wilson, Ryan Phillips, and Barry Mitchell were on the defensive line," Tormey said.

The defense showed promise during Spring drills as they dominated the offense in all of the scrimmages but one.

This fall the Vandals return Phillips, a six-foot four-inch junior defensive end who grabbed All-American honors last season. Phillips' counterpart (Mitchell) also returns this year and don't be surprised to see these two stand-out defensive ends meeting in the offensive backfield on more than one occasion.

After sitting out a year, middle-linebacker Jason Shelt once again will appear on the gridiron and hopefully live up to his mention as a 1994 pre-season All-American. Shelt, a junior, sat out last year with a medical redshirt because of a serious knee injury in only the second game of the season and won't begin practicing until fall.

All in all, the UI defense impressed Tormey in Spring drills, but he did mention the fact that there needed to be a little more depth at the defensive back slots.

"The defense turned it around out there. They looked good. Continuity is hard to protect and I think they did a great job although we still need to improve the defensive backs," Tormey said.

The offensive puzzle is far from complete, but slowly the bits and pieces are falling into place.

At running back Tormey was surprised by the performance of returning junior Lavoni Kidd. Kidd, who left last year for personal reasons, performed brilliantly, leading two different scrimmages in yards per gain.

"Lavoni Kidd took a year off and came back and proved he could play. I was very surprised at his performance. He did a great job," Tormey said.

Five-foot eight-inch junior returning running back Joel Thomas also had an outstanding spring season, rushing for 100 yards and 114 yards in the first two scrimmages.

Going into the fall season, not even those cracks from the 1-800 psychic hotline could tell you who will start at the quarterback slot.

Both Brian Brennan and Robert Scott had impressive spring drill performances, but coaches are waiting for last year's starter Eric Hisaw to return from his right knee injury.

"Both quarterbacks have their good and bad sides. I will say this; nothing is final until the start of the first game," Tormey said.

Tormey also felt that after watching spring drills he needs more depth at wide receiver and also an improvement on the kicking and punting game.

On an overall team scale the newly acquired coach is smiling after a somewhat successful spring outing.

"We got better as a team and better at each position. A number of position players were identified, but like I said, nothing is final," Tormey said.

Because the NCAA rules do not allow for teams to have organized workouts over the summer, most of the workouts will be voluntary, or as one might say, "life or death." The new incoming freshmen will first meet here in Moscow on August 7 and the team as a whole will meet on the 10.

Finally, the first phase of Tormey's first season is over, and one might say that the former UI player has earned an A at putting football puzzles together.

Panel discusses college 'play-for-pay'

Ben Carr

Million dollar salaries; performance incentives for players; free agency; the day might not be too far ahead where these forms of payment are not limited just to professional sports athletes, but are an everyday thing in the world of collegiate athletics.

In the billion dollar industry that is now operated by the NCAA, many of the "pay-for-play" options already available to athletes in the NFL and NBA might one day be available to college athletes.

University of Idaho Athletic Director, Pete Liske and academic coordinator for student-athletes, Laurie Turner, went head to head with law professor Jim MacDonald and Economics professor John Wenders last Thursday in a panel discussion sponsored by the Economics club. The purpose of the discussion was to try to answer some of the questions raised by the issue of pay for college athletes.

College athletics is a billion dollar industry. With so much money being made, very little is actually given to the people who make the bowl games, "big dances," and intense rivalries possible: the athletes.

Some people might suggest that student-athletes are already paid; many people who participate in college athletics are given partial or even full scholarships, but these athletic scholarships are not a true measure of how much these players are worth.

What did Doug Nussmeier do for UI when he took the Vandals to the third round of the I-AA playoffs in 1993? How much revenue did the "Palouse Posse" bring in for Washington State last season? Sometimes these questions can't just be answered in terms of dollars and cents, but must also be considered in terms of increased exposure to national audiences which results in more recruiting for athletics and increased academic enrollment. Basically, more money for the university.

Many economists have suggested that the NCAA is actually a "buyers cartel." A cartel is basically a group of businesses that collude with one another in order to control the prices and production of the goods in an industry. The NCAA controls college athletics, and controls it with an iron hand.

The NCAA limits how much a university can give to its student-athletes. Boosters are not allowed to pay athletes money, nor are athletes allowed to earn themselves money in the form of commercial endorsements. In fact, an athlete on a full scholarship cannot even supplement their scholarship with income from a part-time job. Any money they earn must be subtracted from their scholarship. With a system limited as much as college athletics, it is only natural that cheating occurs.

The horror stories of big-time schools offering under the table payments to athletes are quite common. Nowadays, it might be difficult to find an athletic department in the country that is actually "clean." A true economist would suggest that the easiest way to eliminate cheating under the rules of the NCAA would be to abolish the NCAA.

College coaches can earn millions of dollars and can earn even more in the form of lucrative shoe contracts, but the players, the people who make it all happen, earn almost nothing. And the NCAA allows it all to be possible.

During the discussion Turner suggested that with their scholarships, football players at UI make about $16 an hour. Of course, this figure does not take into account the traveling time that players have every week during the season. This figure also does not account for the off-season training an athlete goes through in order to retain their scholarship season after season, nor does it take into account the costs many athletes face as a result of their sports participation. Things like lower grades, loss of sleep and hours spent recovering from an athletic event are not calculated in Turner's figures.

Law professor Jim MacDonald suggested that the present system of governing college athletics was actually a "racist, plantation system" where the revenue sports of football and basketball, dominated by African-American athletes, are used to subsidize the non-revenue generating sports like tennis and golf, which are dominated by rich white athletes. There is basically a redistribution of income from black people to white people, with the full knowledge of the U.S. government.

This is the same government that is attempting to prosecute Microsoft Corp. because it is accused of many of the same things that the NCAA is: fixing prices, limiting production, all in all acting like a monopoly power.

While few issues were actually solved in the course of the discussion, it is important to recognize the different sides to the issue.

The NCAA feels that it is acting in the best interests of student-athletes when it limits how much compensation he or she can receive for his or her participation in a sport. Economists feel that the NCAA has its own interests in mind and are actually harming the athletes when it limits the amount a player can earn.

This is not an issue that will be settled on the grassy fields of fall, or the hard courts of winter, but only in the courtroom.

Vandal men shine in Pullman

Dan Eckles
Sports Editor

With just two weeks remaining to tune up before the Big Sky Track and Field Championships, the University of Idaho men's track team wasted no time shifting into turbo at the Washington State Cougar Dual Meet Saturday.

Idaho triple-jumper Chris Kwaramba vaulted a personal best 49-foot 2 1/2 inches to win the event and qualify for the BSC Championships in Boise May 17-20. Kwaramba bested second-place finisher Monyay Green of Washington State by more than four inches in his PR performance.

Freshman sensation Felix Kamangirira flew by the competition in the 400 meter race, finishing in first place. The Water Falls Harare, Zimbabwe native set a personal best mark as well and qualified for the BSC postseason meet by leaving his competitors in the dust with a time of 46.74 seconds. Kamangirira beat WSU's Jim Carkner by more than a second and a half.

The 100m race saw Idaho fare well. UI football player Montrel Williams, who rejoined the track team last week at the conclusion of spring drills, and Jason St. Hill tied for third with a time of 10.69 seconds. The time qualifies both sprinters for the BSC meet and is the fastest by a Vandal all year.

Pendleton, Ore. native Kyle Daley threw the hammer 184-02 for the Vandals to finish fourth and grab a personal best mark as well. Dan Zorich of Oregon won the event with a toss of 195-10.

Idaho junior Jill Wimer pulled off a hat trick in Boise Saturday, winning the javelin, shot put and discus competitions.

Idaho's 4x100m relay team posted its best time of the spring, finishing with a time of 40.30 seconds. There is no BSC qualifying time for the event.

Paul Thompson won the 400m hurdles for Idaho with a time of 52.26, but the Lichfield, England runner posted a better time in late March. Scott Whalen was fourth in the event with a season best time of 53.19. The mark qualifies the senior for next week's Boise meet.

In women's action Idaho junior Jill Wimer pulled off a hat trick at the Boise State Quadrangular Saturday. Wimer took home first place finishes in the javelin, discus, and shot put however, none of the marks were season bests. The Grangeville native had qualified for the BSC meet in all three events already this spring. She won the javelin with a toss of 147-0, the discus with a throw of 133-5 and the shot put with a 42-8 1/4 toss.

In a weekend where no Vandal woman posted a season best mark, Shelley Zickler finished second in the 1,500m with a time of 4:43.02. Zickler ran the event almost nine seconds faster two weeks ago.

Emily Wise was a second-place finisher as well, running the 100m hurdles in 15.08.

Erickson getting bum rap

Mark Vanderwall

It was a little more serious than hiding your report card from your parents, or telling your girlfriend that the perfume she smells on your clothes is your mother's, but whether or not former Idaho and Miami (FL) football coach Dennis Erickson is guilty is another story all together.

With allegations of drunken driving and withholding positive drug results at the south Florida school already hampering Erickson's once untainted coaching credentials, you can accurately say, "Welcome to the Big Leagues."

Moving from the college ranks up to the NFL has found Erickson, hired earlier this winter by the Seattle Seahawks, with more people wanting him to fall flat on his face than there are people who still want to see those pearly whites of his shine in the spotlight.

In the DUI incident, Erickson blew a .23, which was more than twice the legal limit and has been sentenced to two years probation. In the second, he is said to have withheld positive drug results prior to Miami's Orange Bowl appearance on Jan. 1. This accusation was further enhanced by Warren Sapp's failure of a routine drug test during the NFL combines earlier this year. Sapp would have surely been the number 1 pick, but these results dropped his playing stock like an anvil in a Bugs Bunny cartoon.

Let's say, hypothetically, that Erickson did withhold these results, what good coach at the major Division I-A level wouldn't have done the same to give their players a chance to come clean before they blew the whistle on them.

I am not at all saying what has happened is right, nor do I condone drug usage, but until one of us is put into this situation, we really can't speculate what we would have done.

Miami was the team of the 80s in college football and is still making a name for its program in the 90s, so allegations that someone might have used drugs would have made a class program into a corrupt one and all that it accomplished in the past would be tarnished by these accusations. We saw what it did to the University of Washington's program when it was on top and what it did to UNLV in basketball. We will yet see what it does to Miami.

These are just prime examples of what happens when you run a class program that maintains a high level of success. People will do anything to bring you down from the pedestal. They usually accomplish what they set out to do and that is turn a good program into a bunch of used-to-be's so that someone else can have their shot at the top. Then once a new team reaches that level, politics will once again kick in and they will no longer reign on top as well.

The NCAA has gotten to be more like the NOAD (National Institute for Athletic Demise), and with the passing of the crown, comes the NOAD sniper as well. If the NCAA would worry more about trying to better the smaller programs than they do about bringing the good ones down, they would be doing the people of America a favor.

With the trend steadily growing towards athletes leaving college early, you can only wonder if this system of B.S. is affecting their decisions as well. With players being denied the right to play in charity events for a small fee, or allowed the opportunity to work during the school year if they are scholarshiped, how can the NCAA say that players receiving money from Alumni or unnamed sources is a violation of their policy. That is like saying that just because you are an athlete you can't work and if you can't work you can't make money. If you can't make money you can't eat and if you can't eat you can't survive, and we all know what happens after that. This is why there is so much pressure on both players and coaches at the college level and it is also why there are so many violations every year in the NOAD.

I guess this was the year that they drew Miami out of their little hats as the target for the onslaught. It is too bad that Erickson may go down with them. It has gotten so political at the college level that it is no wonder both the players and the coaches are moving on in their perspective careers.

Pacers' Miller has Knicks fuming

David Steele
Newsday

The raw nerve is still exposed, as much as the New York Knicks tried to say it wasn't.

They tried hard Monday to show the world that they weren't broken, or even bowed, by their stunning collapse against the Indiana Pacers the day before at Madison Square Garden. And it took more than a second-day barrage of questions from a horde of 50 media members at Purchase College to make them crack.

What rubbed that raw nerve was the mention of Reggie Miller, and his taunts of "choke artists," and his boast of a Pacers sweep.

"Whenever a player comes out and makes statements like that, he has to understand what he's putting himself into," John Starks said as he left the gym. "He said what he had to say, and now he has to deal with it."

Asked to elaborate, Starks said, "He just has to deal with what he said. He said they came out with the feeling they were going to sweep us. I don't know where he got that idea from. But he said what he had to say. Now it's up to him to prove that he can go out and do it."

Charles Smith chimed in with this: "He wants to say those kind of things, and hopefully everybody will write about it and he looks like a hero, if it goes well for him. And when nothing happens, it's like, '(The Knicks are) expected to win,' and no one says anything. So he just runs his mouth."

Someone wondered if Smith might make Miller pay for running his mouth—say, with a hard foul. "I don't have any to spare," he said with a laugh, mindful of his penchant for quick fouls. "Maybe someone else, not me."

Whatever the Knicks do to erase the memory of Miller's explosion (athletically and verbally) in Sunday's first game of the Eastern Conference semifinal series, they'll have to start in Tuesday night's second game at the Garden. Losing Tuesday night and falling behind the Pacers 0-2 going to Indianapolis would make the Knicks' chances of advancing almost impossible. At this point, the Knicks know nothing has been decided, especially given that they have beaten the Pacers three consecutive times at Market Square Arena (including last spring's do-or-die Game 6 of the Eastern finals).

The players said the media aided and abetted Miller by chewing up and spitting out every word he said. Still, the players eagerly took the bait when reminded that Miller followed his eight-point outburst in the final 16.4 seconds with these outbursts: He called the Knicks "choke artists" and later said, "We got this one, and we're not settling. We want to win two, and if we can close this out 4-0 we'll do that. We're a greedy ballclub."

"Well, Reggie's going to say things like that," Starks said. "But that's just one win. When you win a game like that, when they just happen to luck up and win one, you have to be humble about it, and I guess he wasn't humble about it, running off at the mouth. So that's him. We just have to go out there and play our game and do our thing."

Letters to the Editor

Anger a source of skepticism?

Closed minds abound, by Ralph Nielsen (letter, May 5) attacked me and hurt me. I can take the pain of it, but what I can't accept is the general falsehood of it. In it, Mr. Nielsen suggests that those who are striving to follow God are brain-washed. It occurred to me, while reading the letter, that I should ask the question, "who is really brain-washed, the one who sees or the one who doesn't see?" You call my faith in God blind, but I say that your lack of faith in God is blind. I say that I see a judgment day coming, but you say you don't see a judgment. I say that I have both seen and felt the love of God, but you've seen nothing. I tell you that I have looked at the beauty in the world that God has created, but what do you see there, a jumble of chaotic atoms?

I look at the people around me that care about me, that have been good to me, that have fed me when I've been hungry, that have laughed with me, that have cried with me, that have talked to me kindly, and I see my brothers and sisters. What do you see?

When I read your letter I can't help but thinking that somewhere along the line you've been really hurt, probably by someone having to do with church, and you are reacting out of that pain. Maybe you were a Mormon, and maybe you were a Christian, I don't know. It seems to me that the most likely story is that you dropped out of a church, and the light, and the love, and the goodness that you found there is at war with you now. I suspect that you are having an inner conflict not so much because God has been so terribly bad to you, but because you are angry with yourself over the opposition you have placed yourself in regarding the goodness you once felt in your previous church.

The reason I suspect this is because I know people, and am associated with those that fit the description and are expressing the same kind of anger that I find in your letter. The anger that a person feels in such a circumstance again has more to do with guilt and awareness of that persons own misconduct than it actually has to do with any crime that God has committed against the individual. The struggle and the turmoil is evidence of a residual faith that the guilty/angry person is hoping to stamp out of themselves in order to completely justify their own actions. A truly faithless person wouldn't bother to try to eliminate a religion that has existed for generations, and that will continue to exist for generations to come.

By your struggle you show a seed of faith in your own heart. I encourage you to nurture that seed. I encourage you to throw the compost on the plant that grows therefrom, not on the weeds to make them ranker. Freethinkers are those who can feel the love of God and accept it, not those who choose to blindfold themselves, grope around in the dark, and call themselves clever.

I have written to you with the intentions of a friend, not those of an enemy.

—Darren Christensen

Column needed more research

Jennifer Swift's recent article about Microsoft is an example of a lack of information coupled with a personal preference (Mac operating systems over Windows) to form a misguided opinion. In order to reconcile her article with reality, I will address the main points and then explain some of the economics involved.

Key to her argument is that the Microsoft dominance of the software market is the same as the Bell systems and that of cable providers. This is an example of false logic. The monopoly status enjoyed by the telephone and cable companies is derived from and maintained by government regulation. The dominance by Microsoft is derived from and maintained by consumer choice. If you believe that a dominant company in an industry cannot topple, look at IBM. They are just now starting to recover from their fall from market domination to near collapse. And IBM's recovery is in no way secure, since they still rely heavily on the sales of mainframes for revenues.

Her second point is that Microsoft, once they obtain a monopoly, will raise prices and charge whatever the hell they want is shown to be absolutely false. Every market Microsoft has entered has seen prices fall and quality of service rise. Innovation has also, contrary to your dire predictions, moved along at a mind boggling pace.

Finally she states that she is neither a computer expert nor an economics expert. Do you think, Ms. Swift, that maybe you should have consulted with some of these experts before you formed such a damning opinion?

There are some intriguing issues in the Microsoft case that could have been raised. The relevancy of the Sherman act, the appointment of Anne Bingaman (wife of Senator Bingaman) to the position of Assistant Attorney General for Antitrust and the decision of Microsoft to locate in Utah (home of Senator Orrin Hatch, chairman of the senate Judiciary committee dealing with antitrust and monopolies).

The Sherman Act was enacted in 1890. It is short and simple. To paraphrase, it says no person shall monopolize any part of trade or commerce. The economic validity of even this simple law is questionable at best. A monopoly in itself is not bad for the consumer. The only time a monopoly harms the consumer is when the firm abuses its monopoly power. As stated before, the prices fall and the quality increases in all of Microsoft's areas of domination.

If monopoly power is abused, that abuse is the driving force behind innovation that eventually makes the monopoly power ineffective. Witness the rise of satellite television as a response to the (regulatory enforced) cable monopoly. If the regulations were lifted, you could have four immediate choices for obtaining television signals, telephone lines, cable lines, satellite dishes and microwave signals. These are in addition to the innumerable entertainment and news sources.

The appointment of Anne Bingaman to the office of Assistant Attorney General for Antitrust is a much greater abuse of power than any of the unproved allegations against Microsoft. Her role model was Thurman Arnold, the man that held the office under Roosevelt. His major accomplishment? "He took the division when it had under 35 lawyers and built it to 144 in a five year period," Anne Bingaman said in an interview in Forbes describing why Arnold is her role model.

The woman has little grasp on the realities of a dynamic economic system. She talks of regulation "snapshot" monopolies. A snapshot monopoly is an absolutely scary thought to innovators. If you invent something, you have a snapshot monopoly until the marketplace is filled with other competitors. For those of you interested in the idea on American economic imperialism Anne Bingaman should be your enemy. She has the gall to subpoena confidential business records of foreign companies in their home markets, a questionable practice regarding national sovereignty. Mrs. Bingaman seems to have two qualifying attributes. She is the wife of a Senator who votes with the president 85 percent of the time (from a state that voted for the president at a higher rate than the national average). And she wants to hire more lawyers.

The final point in this mess is the decision by Microsoft to move to Utah. The business decision to move to Utah is a no-brainer. There are two major universities within an hour's drive of the chosen site. The qualified people are already in Utah or are willing to move. The fact that 98 percent of the world's languages are spoken there is significant to a company that has 80 percent of the world's personal computer operating systems. The political gamesmanship in choosing the site was merely to exact the best possible political situation. Think of it as a statement to Orrin Hatch that they could have gone anywhere else but chose Utah, now get this biased/non-economic Attorney General off our backs.

Last stop, the so-called 'real' world

Eleven days from the appearance of this article, the University of Idaho will release another horde of degree-carrying ex-students, ready to descend onto an unsuspecting populace. Some will go directly into the workforce to grab onto their version of the American Dream. Some will go to graduate school, to avoid such a fate, and a lucky few may even get to go directly into retirement.

Regardless of where they go, however, there will be at least one naysayer per graduate (maybe a relative, maybe a friend) who will warn the graduate that they are about to enter...the real world! This person will go on to tell the hapless graduate that they had better buckle down, grow up, get serious, etc., because "things are different in the real world."

This statement is true, except for one detail. The real world doesn't exist.

(Note: Those of you who are going on to graduate school need not read any more of this column; your ticket out of the surreal world of higher education has not yet been punched. Those of you who will be looking for jobs might want to stay tuned.)

Oh sure, there's a world out there that's different than college. It's filled with resumés and interviews, paychecks and employee evaluations. There's no break in the middle for three months, and nobody gets three weeks off for Christmas, except for those who loved college so much they came back to teach it. All the report cards are printed in dollar signs, and if you fail, you have to go to another school.

However, the difference is mostly in perception. In college, the assumption is that you came to learn something you didn't already know. In the workplace, the assumption is that you already know what you need to, and that you came to apply that knowledge for the material gain of yourself and whoever employs you. If not, you get asked to leave (or get booted) and someone takes your place. Other than that, it's the same stuff on a different day.

Think of it this way; if the "real" world was so hard to enter, why would we be going to college, which the aforementioned naysayers would claim is not in the "real" world? There'd be special training for those who want to get prepared for reality, and college would just be a place for those who can afford to drop out of the rat race. Instead, we have the opposite: people coming here so they can be faster rats. Can't be too far removed from the real world, can it?

In the long run, the best advice that could be given to a graduate is, perhaps ironically, be realistic. Having a degree is not a free pass to the good life. The same kind of rules and thought patterns that you dealt with in your educational career are still in effect. The lyrics have changed, but the song remains the same.

Keep it in mind, and good luck with the rest of your life.

—Brandon Nolta

End of year time to reflect

The month of May is a time of mixed blessings.

Warmer weather, the promise of summer and freedom, and blooming crabapple trees are definitely on the good list. The end of the semester, and the end of college can be on either side. Having to pack all of your belongings in boxes to move to either your parent's house or another apartment is definitely on the bad list. It is a month for looking forward, and a chance to look back on everything that has happened to you since September.

What are you going to remember about your year here? Is it going to be who wrote Lysistrata or what the chemical symbol for neon is? Maybe, but in ten years is it going to be your fondest memory? I doubt it.

You will probably remember the parties, or the roommate who always drank the last cold Pepsi and never replaced it, or the professor who took the time to make sure you really understood the material.

Maybe it will be that crazy guy who showed in front of the library with a cross and told us we were all sinners and to accept Jesus Christ as our savior. It is hard to say which memories will stick with you but hopefully they will be good ones.

College is a place where you only get out as much as you put in.

Jennifer Swift

The more you care about your classes, your school, and your experience here the better it will be. Now that it is May, take a look back and decide how much you put into it. Did you do as much as you could have to make this a better place than when you got here? Did you learn what you wanted to this year? Did you make good friends? The wonderful thing about school is that most of us will have a chance to fix the things missed come next fall. We have a chance to do it again.

Next September we get to discover we now have a roommate who always restocks the soda, but eats the Ho-Hos, we get to find a new professor who cares and we might just see the guy with the cross again. Things are not likely to change around here much over the summer. There will be no new laws passed that require uniforms, or we will not suddenly have a new football stadium, but we will have the chance for a clean slate. Everyone made mistakes this last year, stupid decisions and bad calls. We get to erase those and start over.

Others, well, they get to face the world out there. I wish them all luck. We have it pretty easy here, and we usually fail to recognize that until we leave. It can come as a bit of a shock to realize how easy we have it and how different the workplace is than college. The first September that you do not have to buy notebooks, pens and books will feel strange. You will get the urge to go shopping for new clothes, to see large brick buildings and sit at a small desk. The need for a clean sheet of college-ruled notebook paper will be overwhelming. These habits have been bred into you for sixteen years, sometimes more. They are hard to break, so don't panic if they occur. Just go to the nearest Wal-Mart and fondle the three-ring binders and you will feel better.

Unfortunately there are no words of wisdom at the end of this column, no fireworks, no big finale. That is the way it usually is, and in recognition of that I will not light any sparklers or try to tell you something you will carry with you for the rest of your life. You know what you have learned and how much farther you have to go. My only hope is that in some way this space every Tuesday has in some way opened your eyes, made you react and got you talking with friends about important (and some not so important) things. Have a great summer.

Boomers screw us and they wonder why we're apathetic

Much has been said about the MTV generation. You know—Generation X. The baby boomers have called us lazy and apathetic—the Bart Simpson underachievers. The media ignores us. Politicians don't even worry about addressing our concerns.

But few have ever questioned the reasons which underlie this reputation or whether or not our generation even deserves these labels.

Stop for a moment and consider what kind of life our baby boomer parents have left us with.

The earliest members of our generation were born during a time of social upheaval in the '60s, and we were children when the divorce rate began to soar in the 1970s. When the economy faltered in the 1970s for the first time since World War II, our parents freaked out and elected a Republican president and a Democratic congress (nothing like hedging your bets, eh?) who, when they finally arrived at an agreement on the budget, caused the national debt to soar to unprecedented and undreamed-of levels.

And we were teenagers when drugs and violence leaked out of society's fringe elements and infiltrated mainstream American lifestyles, when Hollywood and television became ubiquitous, when inner-city gangs began to take the place of two-parent families, and when drive-by shootings became so common that nightly newscasts stopped reporting them.

We are the children of a nation who has lost its innocence. We are the children of parents who were born in a country which had ideals and goals but has lost them. We are the children who will inherit the nuclear waste nightmare left over from the cold war. We are the children who long for a return to normalcy but have to wait for our turn at the helm of our country's ship.

And we are now a collection of adults who sit silently while our parents' political partisanship and petty bickering are destroying a once-great nation. And we are now a generation who say little but observe much. Pay attention to the lessons history has to offer us. A nation which sticks together grows strong and stays strong. And a nation such as ours which allows itself to sink into the mire of petty internal squabbles will follow the path of its predecessors—great countries like Greece and Rome.

And what will happen when the MTV generation has its first members elected to the United States Congress? Will we allow ourselves to follow the path of our forefathers and allow the national debt to continue to grow unchecked? Don't let anyone fool you—tough times and rough waters lie ahead for us.

Don't count on things being fixed by the time we take over the leadership for this country. If the past 20 years are any indication, our parents will make little headway in solving this nation's problems. Instead, ask yourself, "When the time comes, what will I do to help my nation?"

John F. Kennedy's famous inaugural address, which told Americans to "ask not what your country can do for you, but what you can do for your country," apparently did not have the effect President Kennedy wanted it to.

Here is where the strength of our generation lies. Most of us have worked since we were in high school because we were growing up in the early 1980s. We know about self-reliance, and we know what it takes to become successful—hard work. Hard work is what it will take for this country to survive and to stay strong.

We cannot—we must not—look to the government to provide everything for us. If we want to count on a financially secure retirement, we must begin to save for it now. Social Security will be bankrupt by the time we begin to retire. If we lose a job or fall upon financial hard times, let us first help ourselves and then turn to our family and to our friends for help.

Current welfare and assistance programs have created a cult of dependency which we must shrug off if we want to continue to live with the modern comforts which we now have. The time has come and the battle cry is for a renewal of self-reliance and individualism.

We are just the generation to do it. Even Bart Simpson is capable of doing something worthwhile on occasion.
