

Finalists named in Provost search

Candidates to visit UI campus, extensions

Michelle Kalbeitzer

The provost search is nearing an end with University of Idaho President Robert Hoover's selection of three finalists. "He (Hoover) was exceedingly thorough in his review of the candidates," said Dale Gentry, dean of the College of Education and head of the provost search committee. The finalists are Loren Crabtree, College of Liberal Arts dean at Colorado State University; Brian Pitcher, dean of the College of Humanities, Arts and Social Sciences at Utah State University; and Risa Palm, College of Arts and Sciences dean at the University of Oregon. Beginning March 31, each candidate will spend several days visiting the UI campus and the extension offices in Boise, Coeur d'Alene and Idaho Falls. During their visits the candidates are also scheduled to interview with several members of the university community. Pitcher's interview schedule is March 31 to April 4. Crabtree is scheduled to visit April 6 to April 9, and Palm will be here April 16 to April 18. University Communications Director Kathy Barnard said Hoover hopes to make a decision as soon as possible after all interviews are completed. A search committee was assigned the responsibility of evaluating approximately 75 applicants from across the nation. Of those 75, the committee forwarded seven candidates to Hoover for further consideration. "It was a very strong pool of candidates," Gentry said. Douglas Adams, department of English chair and search committee member, explained some of the selection criteria. "In choosing names of candidates to send to the president, the search committee was looking for people who had central administrative experience in complex, preferably land-grant, institutions that were similar in size and complexity to UI," Adams said. Gentry said a differentiating factor for the finalists was that "they had experience at all academic roles that encompass the entire university." The finalists are also "a good match for this position and the needs of the university as reflected in the job description," Gentry said. The provost search began in October. George Simmons is serving as interim provost until the new provost is selected.

Money available for international study

Deadline for Rotary International Fellowships is next week

Students interested in receiving up to $22,000 to study abroad in 1998 have until April 4 to apply for a Rotary International Ambassadorial Scholarship. Rotary International offers three types of Ambassadorial Scholarships to students who are proficient in a foreign language and are well established in their academic program. The Academic Year Ambassadorial Scholarship is open to anyone who has completed at least two years of university study or appropriate professional study. This scholarship covers transportation, room and board, tuition, fees and miscellaneous expenses for one academic year of study abroad. The Multi-Year Ambassadorial Scholarship is either a two- or three- year award. The scholarship provides $11,000 a year to students pursuing a specific degree in another country. Students who have completed at least one year's equivalent of training in a foreign language and are interested in intensive language training and cultural immersion in another country can apply for the Cultural Ambassadorial Scholarship. This scholarship is either a three- or six-month award and provides funding for tuition, room and board or homestay accommodations, and round-trip transportation. UI professor wins humanities award

University of Idaho Law Professor Dennis Colson has received the Idaho Humanities Council Outstanding Achievement Award. Colson is the recipient of the council's 1996 award for "outstanding achievement in the humanities," said IHC Chairman Vince Hannity, who presented a plaque to Colson at a special dinner in his honor. The IHC makes the award annually to individuals and institutions that have advanced the public understanding of the humanities in significant ways in Idaho. "The council makes this award not just for one major accomplishment Dennis has made in the past year," Hannity said, "but for the many contributions he has made over the years that have promoted the awareness and appreciation of the humanities." Colson has been affiliated with UI since 1975, where he has specialized in Idaho Indian Law and Idaho Constitutional history. He is the author of Idaho's Constitution: The Tie That Binds and numerous articles and papers that explore the fields of both jurisprudence and Idaho and Pacific Northwest history. Colson is a former member of the Idaho Humanities Council board of directors, and has served as a scholar and consultant on numerous humanities projects. "So far as I can remember there has never been a time when I was not actively involved in a Humanities Council project," Colson said. "I've found that doing humanities projects has made me more conscious of the humanities implications of my other activities: teaching, lawyering, consulting." The IHC board of directors reviews nominations and selects a recipient for the annual award for "Outstanding Achievement in the Humanities" each fall. The award traditionally Committee of the Moscow Rotary Club, said in general these fellowships are awarded to college students, but they also have fellowships for faculty, other professionals and high school students.

In fact, Sturgul said Rotary International has the largest fellowship in the world, in terms of both numbers of students and dollars awarded. Each year 1,200 students study abroad with Ambassadorial Scholarships.

The Rotary International Scholarships differ from regular international student exchanges. The objective of the scholarship program is to promote international understanding. The scholarship recipients serve as ambassadors of goodwill during their stay in the foreign country.

Sturgul said Rotary is looking for students who have a project in mind to benefit people in another country.

"We're looking for someone who says, 'I want to study so I can help the people in this country somehow,'" he said.

Students who receive Ambassadorial Scholarships live with host families in the country they choose. "They generally stay with a few different families. The idea is to experience different cultures and people."

Sturgul said the students benefit from the Ambassadorial programs because they can align themselves with any university in their host country. Students are also hosted by the Rotary clubs in that country and therefore receive a lot of support.

The scholarship applications are submitted through local Rotary clubs, which present their candidates nationally. Moscow did not have a scholarship recipient last year, but did have several the year before.

Students interested in applying for Rotary International Fellowships should contact John Sturgul in McClure Hall, Room 405B.

is presented to the recipient at the council's February award meeting.

Nominations are due Sept. 15 each year. Nomination forms are available from the Idaho Humanities Council at 217 State Street, Boise, Idaho 83702.

"We are also accepting grant proposals for the spring deadline of May 15," said Rick Ardinger, executive director of IHC.

"Anyone who would like to submit a proposal should speak to an IHC staff member as soon as possible and submit a rough draft by April 15. If you need a grant for a project or program that explores history, literature, archeology, cultural anthropology, law or other humanities disciplines, the IHC may be able to help," Ardinger said.

The council also offers incentive grants to elementary and secondary teachers to enhance the way they teach the humanities in the classroom.

These grants are limited to $1,000, and may be used to purchase classroom resource materials. Past grants have been given for museum displays, photo projects, oral history projects, lectures and conferences.

The council is also looking for proposals that explore the issue of community preservation as population growth impacts the state of Idaho.

These proposals may be to initiate community forums, to invite special lecturers or to study the aspects of how local community and culture may survive by adapting to change.

All foods fit in National Nutrition Month

Erin Schultz
Staff

Food and nutrition cycles can often be just as common to a culture as clothes fads.

Mary Schwantes, Student Health Services dietician, says that today's nutrition fad is the "no-fat" kick that most of us worry about. Before that, fiber labels dominated new products, and before that, sugarless foods were emphasized.

With this in mind, the American Dietetics Association has set the theme for this year's National Nutrition Month as "All Foods Can Fit."

National Nutrition Month is every March and is sponsored by the American Dietetics Association. Its purpose is to draw attention to eating a balanced diet, having a variety of foods and eating in moderation.

"As long as you eat in moderation, you can have all foods. People come into my office and say what they don't eat, and that's a problem with eating disorders — we are getting into what we don't eat," Schwantes said.

Schwantes says many people also come into her office wondering what exactly a balanced diet is. For this, Schwantes says the food pyramid illustrates an accurate answer to how much of what we need for a healthy diet.

The bottom of the pyramid is made up of bread, cereals, rice and pastas, with a recommended six to 11 servings (a serving is designated as one slice of bread, one ounce of dry cereal, or half a bagel). Next are fruits and vegetables, with a combined recommended serving of at least five. Then dairy and meats, with four servings recommended. At the very top of the pyramid are fats, oils, sweets and other things that should be "used sparingly."

"Fruits and vegetables are probably the most omitted part of the college diet," Schwantes said. "Students tend to eat lots of breads and pastas with the exclusion of fruits and veggies."

One easy way to get more of this neglected food group is to buy frozen stir-fry vegetables and add them to Ramen noodles, which often become the staple diet of the average college student. Another good habit to get into is drinking fruit juice instead of pop.

For vegetarians, the American Dietetic Association says that careful planning can ensure that most all nutrients are covered. Commonly omitted nutrients in a vegetarian diet include protein, calcium and iron. By choosing a variety of plant food sources, vegetarians can get enough of these. Plant foods which are good sources of calcium are dark leafy greens, broccoli, beans, dried figs and sunflower seeds.

The Health Center has a table set up which provides free pamphlets with nutrition information. On Wednesdays, a healthy snack is also featured.

Panel debates Hell's Canyon plan

Margaret Donaldson

Staff

A discussion panel of federal, private and non-profit interests met in McClure Hall March 11 to discuss the problems and issues of the hotly-contested Hells Canyon Recreation Plan.

The U.S. Forest Service, which manages the Hells Canyon National Recreation Area, is in the process of resolving appeals on the final recreation plan.

One goal of the discussion was to gain an understanding of what has been done with the recreation plan in the past to help make decisions in the future.

The controversy of the Hells Canyon Recreation plan stems from nearly two decades of town hall meetings, citizen advisory groups and suggested recreation plans, which many say have been ignored by the Forest Service.

The development of the plan began in 1980 and has resulted in court appeals and frustrated river users, but still there is no plan guiding recreation on the Snake River in Hells Canyon.

Controversy between jet boaters and floaters on the river and concern for wildlife and fish habitat are the main issues guiding the recreation plan.

Despite their differences, a task force of power boaters and floaters developed a plan for the area and presented it to the Forest Service in the early '80s.

However, the final USFS recreation plan included little that the task force had agreed upon. The plan eliminated jet boaters from a section of the river which included the class four rapids.

"There were high-level fingers in the pie," said Art Seamans, a commercial jet boat pilot and retired USFS employee. He said Forest Service officials at the national level suggested to the regional office that the plan eliminate jet boaters.

"This is the most controversial thing I have ever worked on in 25 years with the federal government," Mike Cole, USFS river ranger in Hells Canyon, said about the plan.

Besides the controversy surrounding the Forest Service's brush-off of public input, which they are required by law to include in management decisions, the cost of the plan has raised some interest.

Cole said the USFS has spent over $1 million in planning just on the Snake River.

Ric Bailey from the Hells Canyon Recreation Council said environmental laws, like the Threatened and Endangered Species Act and the Wild and Scenic Rivers Act, were not given enough consideration in developing the recreation plan.

"There is one reason and one reason only that we have land management plans... to protect the land," Bailey said.

Chuck Boyd, owner of Salmon River Experience, said some of Idaho's river guides think the Forest Service has built a crevice deeper than Hells Canyon between the different river user groups.

"I don't know where the system failed, but the general consensus of outfitters is that it failed," Boyd said.

Some members of the audience were left wondering why they should try to become involved in environmental planning if their comments may just be ignored in the end.

Bailey answered, "One passionately written letter in the right place can make a big difference."

All the members of the panel agreed that there should be some regulation of both floaters and jet boaters in Hells Canyon. They also said the failings of the Forest Service in the plan's development did not come from local managers, but from higher-level influences and politics.

Deputies round up emus

TWIN FALLS, Idaho — A flock of runaway emus made for a scramble by sheriff's deputies, who had to protect their police dog from the raptures.

Four of the flightless birds flew the coop at Daydream Ranch in Rock Creek Canyon about 8 a.m. Friday, and headed toward Municipal Golf Course.

When Twin Falls County Sheriff's Deputy Matt Eden arrived, the birds were getting in the way of duffers headed to the links.

"The golfers said, 'They went that way,'" Eden said.

Eden got the birds headed back into the canyon, but went ahead to the ranch to get some assistance. Everyone was gone, however. Larry Holland, owner of the birds, was in Las Vegas, employees said.

Range Deputies Darren Brown and Tom Carter joined the roundup.

Eden made the mistake of letting his dog out of his patrol car for a break. Ukas is a drug-sniffing canine, but not good at herding animals.

"Emus don't like dogs. They took him as a threat," Eden said. "We had emus running at us, and we weren't quite sure what to do."

He hustled Ukas back into the car, and the three officers managed to rout the birds and head them back into the canyon where they were corralled.

Idaho code contains a provision for emus at large.

"Actually, I think it's the same as livestock at large, but it does state that there is a code for emu," Eden said.

Police investigate link between bomb, book

TWIN FALLS, Idaho — Police are investigating any connection between a device which emptied a local bank office and fliers advertising "The Anarchist's Cookbook."

A device was found March 18 outside Washington Federal Savings and Loan. Someone obviously had spent time and effort assembling it, city detectives said.

The device was crudely made, but contained all the components needed for a bomb.

An ordnance-disposal team from Mountain Home Air Force Base destroyed the object, and police will send the remnants to a Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms lab for analysis.

About 300 fliers were placed on car windshields in the Twin Falls High School parking lot March 13, offering "The Anarchist's Cookbook" for sale through a Twin Falls post office box.

It is a collection of instructions for making bombs, setting fires and creating civil unrest, and is available in many forms, including the Internet.

The fliers advertised a 600-page book for $30. Putting advertising on car windshields is a violation of city ordinances, said high school student resource officer Brian Pike, a city policeman.

"Our concern is in what may be the motives behind it," Pike said. "If it's money, that's one thing. If it's trying to promote anarchy, or domestic terrorism that's something else."

Handing out the fliers or even having the book is not illegal, Pike said. But it is worrisome.

"My concern as a resource officer is that you target the high school because high school students have money, but they get their hands on something that could lead to people getting hurt," Pike said.

The fliers were distributed by an 18-year-old student, Pike said, and the motive appears to be profit.

Moscow station manager bumped

IDAHO FALLS — The manager of the Idaho Public Television station in Moscow has left KUID as part of an administrative reorganization.

Ken Segota, former chief technical operator at KUID, is now interim station manager.

He replaces Russ Spain, the manager and director of community services. Spain said he learned about the move only Thursday.

"I'm just leaving my options open at this point," he said.

The administrative shuffle is in line with the state Board of Education's push for agencies to sharpen their skills in technology and education, Public Television general manager Peter Morrill said.

The community services director will be replaced by an educational services chief, working in Moscow, Morrill said Friday.

There will be a search for someone with a background in education, Morrill said.

Paquin offers "fresh face" alternatives in bid to oust Chenoweth

Tim Lohrmann
Asst. Opinion Editor

In the midst of a surging exploratory process that may lead him to a Republican squabble for the 1998 Congressional nomination, Coeur d'Alene businessman Tony Paquin took time out last week to discuss his as yet undeclared candidacy with the Argonaut.

Stressing his belief in dramatic tax reform, and uncompromising commitment to education and the need for expanding Idaho's share of high-tech job opportunities, Paquin pledged to avoid negative campaigning while attempting an ouster of two-term incumbent Helen Chenoweth.

This is part one of a two-part series. Part two will appear in the March 29 Argonaut.

Arg: First of all, Tony, you're a 38-year-old guy. You're successful professionally and presumably provide your family with a nice living and live in a beautiful city. Why in the world do you want to submit yourself to the torture of a primary against an incumbent when you'll be submitted to every kind of controversy, background test and everything else? What's going on?

TP: Yeah, I know. That's a good question and you do get that. Obviously, this is a big decision and part of that decision is exactly those kinds of issues. You know, we talked about that as a family: "Do we really want to go through with this?"

I tell you what happens, though. At least what happened to me is when you have a child — I have a 6-year-old — and when you have a son, it kind of changed my focus a little bit. What kind of deal are we handing over to him and his generation? And when you begin to look at that, you realize it's not very good. In fact, it's morally corrupt. You know, the bankrupt Social Security, the Medicare problem and the interest on the national debt. We're Arg: You've mentioned that some of your focuses will be on creating new jobs, tax reform and education. Could you expand on these areas?

TP: If you were to take everybody in Idaho and really for that Right now my belief is that Chenoweth isn't addressing either group.

These are the real mega issues:

We need to dramatically reform the tax system in this country. I'm a proponent of the flat tax. That's the one that Dick Armey (R. Texas) is proposing in the House. A 17 percent flat tax. The idea would be that you eliminate all deductions. The tax code today is like 8,000 pages. It's virtually impossible to comply with it, and it's just plain unfair. We need to reform taxes and overhaul the way government does business.

On the education front, I think it's really critical as we move into the next century that we protect the job of the guy who's out cutting trees, the natural resource industry in the state. We need to protect that the best we can. But we also need to realize that the children of those people are very likely not going to find a lot of jobs out in the forest. They're going to find jobs in the technical industries, in the service industries. We need to develop those economies and develop the skill sets, and we're going to do that through an emphasis on education.

Arg: Dan Williams (Chenoweth's Democratic opponent in 1996) had a very respectable showing against Chenoweth. How would you contrast yourself with him?

TP: I don't believe that this district, in the near future, will vote in a liberal Democrat, which is what Williams is. He's a bigger government, more spending kind of guy. I like what he did. I thought he ran a respectable campaign and did a professional job at it. But you can't get away from the fact that he's a Boise attorney, and a Democrat.

really kind of handing all of this off to my son and that whole generation.

I've done very well. I'm successful, I'm a family man and I'm concerned about my son. I've got to be able 15 years from now to sit down with him and say, "I've done everything I can do, now you need to take what you have and make the best life you can, but at least I did everything I can do." That means doing things like running for Congress and trying to make some changes.

matter all Americans, you could break them into two groups. One group would be my age and older, and our group is concerned about retirement. Social Security — is it going to be there? Medicare — who's going to pay for health care for aging Baby Boomers?

Then the other group is really my age and younger. They're concerned if there is even going to be Social Security. What are the job opportunities going to be in this country, and really in Idaho, for the next century?

Young, dumb and ugly

These kids today. Let them wear their baggy trousers and ballcaps just as long as they remember they have brains and use them occasionally.

A keen desire for frank idiocy on the part of a few teenagers earlier in the month brought a modicum of anger and injury to an already harrowing experience.

While taking his son — suffering a severe asthma attack — to the hospital, a good friend of the family had a run-in with the flower of today's youth.

On the dark country road to the hospital, this carload of punks thought it would be fun to play at Speed Racer. They figured going 20 miles an hour was fast enough, until our family friend tried to pass them. Then, boy oh boy, 50, even 60 miles per hour was what was called for.

Tired of the race after 2 or 3 miles, our friend made the mistake of getting out of the car to reason with these morons. Their sympathy for a father's medical emergency boiled down to a punch in the face.

Fortunately, a shot of adrenaline is a good fix for asthma, because after a few more punches from father and son and the arrival of a few more witnesses on the scene, the punks fled — dragging our friend with their car long enough for him to get a nasty cut up his side. What started as a father taking his son to the hospital for treatment turned into the exact opposite.

Now, not every teenager out there is an irresponsible moron, but there are enough like these, with little to no respect for authority — or for humanity — and nothing but selfishness firming up their egos to make even we countrified people wonder what the world is coming to.

Popular culture preaches quick fixes, snappy comebacks and consequences which place emphasis on humor rather than responsibility or respect and even the most common of courtesies. With our educational systems becoming moral vacuums and our families being crushed under increasing financial and societal burdens, simple things such as the teaching of respect and common sense are ignored in favor of diversity training and cable television.

When things go wrong, when we shake our heads in disgust and shame when we hear such stories or read of them in the paper, it is not society which has failed. It is we — who have not taught nor bothered to learn or place emphasis on the Golden Rule — who have failed society.

Respect must be taught and ought to be expected. Anything less is the greatest detriment to society ever conceived.

I asked the clerk at the pet store:

Why does my fish keep rubbing against the stone?

If I buy another fish and my fish falls in love, will Beebles be happier than when Beebles was alone?

The clerk threw me out of the store.

The Democrats need to rethink their position. They've got to get on-line with the idea that we need to modernize government. We've got to reduce the costs. We're spending money right now that we don't have — we're spending my son's money, and that's just wrong. Until the Democrats figure that out, I don't think they're going to get this seat in this district. That's the difference. Williams is a Boise attorney who wants to spend more and tax more. I'm a Coeur d'Alene businessman who knows about building jobs. I understand the need to provide critical services out of government. We've got to find new ways of doing it, because the way we're doing it now just isn't going to work in another 10 to 15 years. The bills are coming due.

Arg: Have you heard Williams is considering running again?

TP: We've heard there are a couple of people talking about running for the seat on that side of the fence. I fully expect there will be a well-qualified challenge in the general election. We're expecting to wage a very competitive race all the way.

Arg: How do you stand on keeping away from negative campaigning? I'm sure with attacking an incumbent this will be an important issue.

TP: Yeah, that's a very interesting thing, and frankly it's even more of an issue when you're challenging an incumbent in your own party. I have a lot of friends here and a lot of associates in the party whom I really don't want to offend in any way, so we're going to leave the negative campaigning alone. We don't really see a need for it. If there are negative issues out there in Chenoweth's case, we'll let her respond to those. But we really see our job as putting our message together and to get out and talk about our message, which is jobs, education and tax reform. In this case I don't really see a benefit to negative campaigning.

Arg: We've talked a lit-

“ We need to dramatically reform the tax system in this country. I'm a proponent of the flat tax. That's the one that Dick Armey (R. Texas) is proposing in the House. A 17 percent flat tax. tle bit about the natural resource industries. Here in Moscow there is a great deal of concern about land use issues and old-growth logging. What are your concerns?

TP: We need to be sensitive to local economies as we take a look at these issues, which I think historically has not been the case. So that we have to bring into account the impact that we're having on the economy if we're going to make changes in logging. Part of it is we can't attack one thing without solving the other problem. We have to think about where are these people going to work over the next 25 years.

I'm president of the Idaho Technology Association, and we have an initiative we're doing where we're going to most of the small towns in the state and offering our resources to help them assess how that community would fare as a technology community, because quite surprisingly to them, technology companies are moving in from all over the country into these small towns because of the quality of life. If we can create other jobs in those communities, we might be able to evaluate long-term logging strategies. I think common sense has to prevail. We have to take into consideration the economic impacts of those types of decisions.

In part two of this series, Paquin discusses further his views on education, natural resources and tax reform. He may be contacted via e-mail at tony_paquin@msn.com. Paquin has a web site at <http://www.paquin.org>

If the shoe fits...

Big Brother in Boise is burping up swamp gas once again, and the ASUI Senate is spitting it up like day-old spinach.

A bill presently under consideration by the Idaho legislature would change policies used to regulate spending of public money, which certainly includes funds used and disbursed by and through the Senate. The new policies, if approved, would call for stricter accounting and justification of every penny spent.

Senator Curt Wozniak is right to fear that tightening regulations on how and what student money should be spent is an infringement on "student rights and freedoms." He is also quite correct when he said senators do all they can to "maintain their freedom to spend student money as they see fit."

The Senate does an admirable job of governing general student affairs. Supervision by an outside body with little to no knowledge of the day-to-day operations and special needs and concerns of student affairs is wasteful of tax dollars and casts an unmerited light of negativity on those supervised.

The Senate in and of itself is the most effective regulating body necessary. With its clear record of conservatism and existing checks and balances, the Senate — and the programs and organizations it funds — would only be encumbered by new state-mandated regulation.

Which of course makes me hope the bill is passed and the thumbscrews are tightened on our esteemed senators, because many of them indulge in some odd thumbscrew tightening of their own invention.

While defending their right to "spend student money as they see fit" without outside supervision by a bunch of busybodies who don't really know what's going on in their organization, the Senate goes ahead and quietly stomps on those they lord over. This Idaho legislature bill would put Steve Martin's Cruel Shoe on the other foot.

The Graduate Student Association, which has functioned efficiently for the past 10 years, wants independence from the Senate because — silly graduate students — they dare think they know better what graduate students on this campus need.

If the Senate is as altruistic as they claim they should realize that the GSA does know more about what graduate students need and thus help the GSA in as many ways as possible — in ways the GSA sees fit — to help graduate students gain more adequate representation in student government. The GSA is an effective self-regulating body, just as the Senate is, and is quite capable of handling its own affairs without supervision.

Instead, many in the Senate grumble and drag their feet, figuring that as ASUI Senators they know what's best for everybody.

No one knows anything of that sort. People typically know what's best for themselves, and there's absolutely nothing wrong with that.

And yes, that includes the Argonaut. (Pause for a Three Minute Hate while some boo and throw fruit and draw horns and moustaches on my picture.)

The Senate has, as of late, made it a simple thing for the Arg to maintain an adversarial role with its governing body, and the Senate is government no matter how the semanticists argue.

The Arg is not seeking independence from the ASUI. The Arg is seeking, however, the very thing the Senate seeks: trust in its self-regulating ability by those who dish out the dough.

In submitting her budget for the '97-'98 school year, Editor in Chief Corinne Flowers spent hours consulting with present staff to evaluate the specific needs of each section. These recommendations were then presented to the Arg editorial board for approval. Just like the Senate — and in consultation with those most deeply involved with day-to-day procedures and needs at this paper — the Arg deserves the right to spend its portion of student funds as it sees fit.

President Jim Dalton treated Flowers' budget proposal like a Mad Libs story, substituting his own ideas seemingly at whim. Dalton's changes eliminated positions aimed at improving the quality of our paper and diverted funds into areas where it will least serve the student body. Flowers rightly protested this heavy-handed lack of consultation and trust and has been vilified as a 5-foot 4-inch Cruella de Vil, which she most certainly is not.

Dalton is an able student leader, but he is no journalist — which many may regard as a point in his favor. However, his lack of media experience combined with the Senate's petty distrust of the Arg, and its many levels of accountability (student advisor, media board, payroll supervision) clearly shows the Senate once again wishes to control something they know little to nothing about.

This two-faced attitude must stop, or the ASUI Senate will find itself with fewer allies than this paper and that boggles the mind.

Letters to the Editor

Accountability, not martyrdom

I have a message for Brian Davidson and the rest of the Argonaut staff who think the ASUI is out to get them: Quit trying to turn yourselves into martyrs.

Like a large number of students on this campus, I am quite fed up with those writers at our paper who feel that Big Brother (a.k.a. The ASUI Senate) is actively working to cancel the press.

The main opinion in the March 11 issue was particularly tearjerking. I really needed a hankie when you insinuated those fascist Senators were going to beat down your doors, destroy your printing presses and insult your family. Very sad.

Actually, there is a little problem with the money you get — it's called accountability. As chairperson of the ASUI Activity Board,

I am faced with dozens of requests for funding from recognized student organizations each month. Do I give them money and say, "Here's a $1,000 gift from the students of the University of Idaho, do with it whatever you want?" Uh, I don't think so. I am distributing the state of Idaho's money, therefore I have to be accountable for where it goes. This process has a great deal of regulation involved, so that money is not misappropriated or spent in ways inconsistent with the interests of our student body.

I am not trying to insinuate that illegal or inappropriate actions are occurring at our student paper, but under your current system, who's to stop it from happening? That is the Senate's aim, and I personally don't think that it's too much to ask.

Kincaid brings talent to Vandal tennis

Kindra Meyer
Asst. Sports Editor

Practice, class, practice, study, sleep...welcome to Tad Kincaid's world. The freshman is not complaining however, and admits the enjoyment of living by the motto, "tennis is life, the rest is just details."

Kincaid joined the University of Idaho's tennis program at semester and with a solid record — he promises to bring a lot of talent to this team in years to come.

Following a short few months at the Air Force Academy in Colorado Springs, he transferred to Idaho because of its higher quality organization. In fact, the transfer occurred in a whirlwind matter of days.

Kincaid called up UI coach Greg South during the winter break to inquire about joining the Vandal program the following fall. South not only eagerly accepted the idea, but expressed an immediate need for his skills. When Kincaid hung up the phone, he began packing up for Moscow to play a match for UI in five days.

"It was amazing. I think we broke the world record getting him in here," South said. "He's such a good student and great player that it made it really easy."

Although he was thrown in the mix mid-season, Kincaid fit in immediately. Previously acquainted with a number of his teammates from tournaments, his arrival just seemed to clique.

Kincaid's tennis career began at 7 years of age and grew into playing tournaments at the national level. Hailing from Portland, Ore., the young athlete is considerably more content being a Vandal than his previous college.

"I like it better here," Kincaid said. "At Air Force you have to get up at 5:00 to guys yelling at you, so this is definitely more laid back. But the

Pikes take intramural basketball crown

Nate Erickson
Staff Writer

The Pi Kappa Alpha basketball team captured the school's intramural basketball championship on March 13 with a 79-74 victory over the Memorial All-Stars.

Ending the three-year reign of Delta Sigma Phi, the Pikes captured their first basketball championship in years.

After going on a winning streak and breaking into the playoffs,

We all knew we had to nut it up if we wanted to win, so we played good defense and worked our offense.

It was Matt Barrett, however, whose tip in with :06 remaining sealed the win.

"I was worried watching the game when it got close," Nuttall said. "Luckily Matt made a great play to clinch it."

Although Eichelberger was the team's leading scorer, it can be said that the real Most Valuable Player of the game was Kye Nuttall, who was out with a broken wrist, the Pikes out-hustled and out-muscled the Memorial All-Stars in a gritty win.

"It was hard watching the title game," Nuttall said. "I wanted to be out there in a close game. In those situations I'm the one who usually handles the ball and shoots the free throws in close games."

Eichelberger stepped up to the occasion and scored 10 points to lead the Pikes, but it was a team consensus to step up and win one for their fallen teammate.

"I usually don't score that much," Eichelberger said. "With Kye down I had to start scoring.

Assignment of guard, former Vandal player James Jones, who played last season for former UI coach Joe Cravens, had proved to be unstoppable for most of the intramural competition. That was until he was matched up with the tenacious Barnes.

"He limited him so that he could never take control of the game," Nuttall said. "He was always picking him up at full court and he was always working to push him away from the basket and really didn't require us to double team Jones."

With their main weapon silenced, the Memorial All-Stars were unable to stay with the Pikes.

Miller leaves UI women's basketball team

Angie Miller, an assistant basketball coach at the University of Idaho since 1994, resigned her coaching position, officials announced on March 13.

Miller, the mother of 10-year-old Ryan, plans to pursue other interests in addition to spending more time with her family.

"I want a change," said Miller, who is looking at the possibility of a tryout with a WNBA team. "Being a new mom and all that, I want to spend more time with my son."

UI coach Julie Holt said Miller will be missed. "She helped develop this program," Holt said of Miller, a former Washington State University standout. "She did a real good job with the players. She had a great sense of humor."

"We will miss her." Helping the Vandals climb from a predicted last-place finish in the Big West Conference's Eastern Division to second in the division and the semifinals of the conference tournament were highlights for Miller.

"We proved something to everybody," Miller said. "I think we're right on the verge of being something big next year and I'm not going to be there."

Miller graduated in 1992 from WSU with a degree in sociology and would like to remain in the Moscow area. Prior to the 1996-97 season, Miller was honored as a member of Washington State's PAC-10 Conference All-Decade team. She was an all-PAC-10 player as a junior and was on the all-freshman team. She sustained a knee injury during her senior season and played only 13 games.

Vandal spring scrimmages to begin

As the weather warms and the outside temperature becomes a bit more tolerable — the University of Idaho football team begins spring practices in the month of April.

If you're looking for something to do in the later parts of the afternoon, stop by and check out the competition outside of the Kibbie Dome.

Three scrimmages are scheduled for the month of April and the final gold and silver game is set for May 2 at 7 p.m.

The other scrimmages are on April 12 and April 19 at 10 a.m. and in Coeur d' Alene on April 26 at 11:30 a.m.

basketball tournament.

Under its rules, there were no divisions based on a town or a high school's population. Every school in the state competed for one state championship.

In Hoosiers we saw Milan High (enrollment 161) travel to Indianapolis to play one of the biggest schools in the state. They of course won the crown in 1954 and their accomplishment has never been forgotten.

This, however, is the last season Indiana will compete as just one division. The Indiana High School Athletic Association (IHSAA) has decided to go to a forum with multiple state tournaments.

Why? The players didn't want it and not many coaches either. It was the high school principals who voted in favor of this measure — more publicity, more trophies, better resumes — rewrite the rules because winning is most important.

No longer will a town of 1,000 pride themselves on taking down an Indianapolis high school. No longer will the little schools have hopes of being the overall state champion.

Greed can ruin even high school sports.

Not only are Indiana's high schools in trouble, but so too is Mr. Basketball himself, Indiana Hoosier coach Bobby Knight.

Knight has always been a disciplinarian and is always in some kind of controversy — although, he is one of the best basketball coaches in the nation and deserves some respect.

A day after Indiana lost by 18 points in the first round of the NCAA tournament, Knight had a meeting with his five junior players — in short, he yelled, swore and did what most coaches would do in that situation.

Soon after, Neil Reed, one of the five juniors, issued a statement on March 18 accusing Knight of verbal and physical abuse. ESPN, CNN and other programs then splashed Knight's mug shot all over television — quicker than you can say "Kansas choked."

Players are getting soft, administrators are getting greedy and one of the best coaches in college basketball is being questioned about his coaching philosophies.

I recently received a fax asking me to vote on the issue involving whether Knight should stay or leave Indiana. It was a public opinion poll created by ESPNET, an Internet sports user service.

Although I won't lower myself to a simple yes or no vote, my advice to Knight would be to leave Indiana. There certainly is a lack of respect when you're not winning and more disrespect when you try teaching your players a thing or two.

Hopefully, the tragedies in Indiana don't begin a domino effect — because, not only will the game of basketball lose competitive high school basketball, Knight and other coaches, but the game itself will be lost.

As high school and college basketball seasons come to a close, let us remind ourselves that the professional world hasn't completely taken over amateur athletics.

Or has it?

March Madness or the 64-team NCAA Tournament was again a big success and the Final Four is still to come. There were plenty of crazy overtime games, upsets, near successful Cinderella stories and so on.

Skeptics who claimed that the underclassmen race to the NBA would ruin college basketball were even silenced — slowly through the quality of games played in the tournament.

But outside the NCAA and the Big Dance, a similar kind of greed which haunts professional sports has ruined a couple pristine realms of high school and college basketball.

The state of Indiana has and may always be known as basketball in heavenly form. However, a recent drive for greed, fame and whining has changed two things sacred to basketball in the Hoosier state and in general.

Indiana high school basketball was made popular and known by Gene Hackman and the movie Hoosiers but the simple fact is — Indiana knows how to run a state

Play by the rules

Byron Jarnagin

Surviving the game! A phrase that parallels an athlete's will to win at any cost, especially when the incentive of an NCAA Championship, a Super Bowl ring, World Series title or a heavyweight belt are on the line.

The operative part of this statement is the will to win at any cost. Many times in sports, professional or not, individual players will resort to cheap shots or illegal actions to put their team over the top.

The whole point is to find an advantage over an opponent by seeing how far the rules can bend. Of course, personal tastes concerning rule leniency of a referee have a significant impact as well.

Nobody wants a structured game with too many rules in which the outcome is based upon a referee's call rather than the player's skill and athleticism. However, there should be an extra effort to curb the extra elbows after a play, another punch after an opponent hits the canvas or intentional late hits out of bounds with intent to injure.

One sport which gives its players a free outlet for aggression is hockey.

Cheap shots are not necessary in hockey because the element of hand-to-hand combat is allowed until the players hit the ice from a blow.

Sure, cheap shots still exist, but hockey players these days have the opportunity to fight back in such a way that players can see the extra blow coming.

Man-to-man fist fights on the ice have become such a large part of hockey that fans expect them during a match. The whole point is the absence of the element of surprise. This aspect of hockey solves the large problem to a certain degree, but cheap shots and blind late hits continue to run rampant through all levels of sports.

Putting competition aside, players won't stand to see their teammates take a late shot in the back. What we have here is a domino effect. One cheap shot leads to another and through the course of a game the problem escalates.

Heck, fans don't want to see their team's players getting knocked around, but would rather see their guys return the favor to compensate for a late hit.

On Friday, HBO featured a boxing program with a Light heavyweight title belt bout. The fight lasted nine rounds and was won by the challenger, Montell Griffin, because of a last minute disqualification of defending champion Roy Jones Junior.

Through the course of the first eight rounds, both fighters exchanged a fairly close number of equal head shots and body blows. At the beginning of the ninth round one fighter came out strong, throwing everything he had. An illegal elbow to the face early in the ninth gave the challenger an easy avenue to his opponents head. The champ was stunned for a few seconds.

Towards the end of this last round, the champ showed some come back strength. Landing right and left combinations and some key head shots, the Atlantic City crowd could tell the challenger was about to hit the canvas. Under his own power, the challenger voluntarily put a knee down signalling he had had enough, but the fight was not over.

After his opponent had taken a knee, the Jones delivered two more shots to the head, knocking the challenger completely down. These last two cheap blows cost the champ the match and his belt.

This is one instance where the system took no guff — incidents like this exist in all sports. Cheap shots are not part of the game and the rules/penalties should not be practiced to compensate for an athlete's extra, internal anger.

PIKES •FROM PAGE 8

Ironically, losing is what taught the Pikes how to win.

"The best thing was the first game of the season that we lost," Nuttall said. "I think it showed us that we weren't as bad as we thought we were and it kind of brought us together as a team and made us understand that we had to play as a team and not as a bunch of individuals if we were going to win it."

After losing the first game of the season to Alpha Kappa Lambda, the Pikes ripped through the rest of their regular season competition.

From there the Pikes blew out Phi Kappa Tau and the Kangaroos, before beating Sigma Nu in a close game.

"We started off pretty slow," Pike player Brad Stith said. "We finally gelled at the end and began playing better during each play-off game."

Nuttall contributes the Pike's success to their defensive intensity they maintained throughout the year.

"We didn't necessarily make a lot of steals or block a lot of shots," Nuttall said. "We just were in the position to deny people easy shots. When someone took a shot, we always had someone in their face to pressure them or alter their shot."

By defeating the Delta Sigs in the first round of the tournament, the Pikes not only avenged a last year tournament loss, but also were able to jump up into second place in the intramural team point race.

Losing a tight contest to the Delta Sigs in the second round of last year's tournament made the Pike's first-round game with the Delta Sigs much more meaningful.

After rolling over the Delta Sigs, the Pikes defeated Sigma Alpha Epsilon, Valley Magic and eventually the Memorial All-Stars.

The succession of victories was enough to overcome Delta Chi, who was previously in second place. The Pikes trail only the Delta Sigs in intramural team points.

main reason I left is because the tennis team is so much better here."

Living a little closer to home is also a plus for Kincaid who has been home to visit his family a couple times already.

Although a new team member and only a freshman, Kincaid must carry the same weight as every other athlete on the team — a task he's eager to fulfill.

"Since every match counts equally, I have to do the same as everyone else — play hard and get the win," Kincaid said. "We need some wins to get ranked 75, which we are definitely capable of."

The opportunity to see many new places has become Kincaid's passion.

"Tennis has given me the opportunity to travel all over and even to some foreign countries. Now that I'm in college we're always on the road and that's my favorite part," Kincaid said.

Now that Kincaid has finally found his place, he and the rest of the team are ready to face a killer schedule the rest of the season.

"We've got a super-tough schedule this year and I'm just looking forward to playing some of the teams like Boise State who are ranked fourth," Kincaid said. "Those kinds of matches are going to be a lot of fun to play and good experience — that's why I transferred."

Slow children at play: Capital Seven strikes back

Shawn Rider
Assistant Outdoors Editor

Never, never, never, never, never grow up. Throughout history philosophers, artists and authors have espoused the tumultuous period we all affectionately call childhood.

We've gotten thrown off a little in these times. Thanks to the techno-rave scene, a hallmark of Gen X has been the return to infantilism: from whistles, lollipops and pacifiers hanging from the necks of raving kids to punker girls clad in baby-doll shirts and bows in their hair our generation seems not only obsessed with a return to infancy but also with an active rejection of adulthood.

Why grow up and become one of "them?"

But there was more to childhood than fashion. What passes for haute couture in the mainstream is really not at all about recapturing the magic of youthfulness; it tends to focus on much more sinister motives: How young and erotic can we make such and such supermodel look?

I have another question for you to ponder, dear reader: Do you remember your first skateboard?

Now we're on the right track. Childhood wasn't all about fashion and attitude. For most of us, it was all a matter of hanging out with friends as late as possible, winning bloody knuckles and avoiding the two worst fates to ever befall an adolescent male — cooties and homework.

Capital Seven is back to help us all return to those days when we didn't have assignments over vacations and a summer job was a legendary position only to be held by much wiser and more mature older brothers and sisters.

Travis Keller, who founded Capital Seven Films with Louie Fountain, said, "All kids wanna grow up so fast, and then once they grow up they want to be kids again."

Never Grow Up is the amazing followup to Friends of Salmon, and satisfies both the avid skater and the casual observer.

Friends of Salmon received rave reviews from the likes of Kevin Smith, the director of Clerks and Mallrats, as well as many other skaters and filmmakers around the country.

Yep, right here in Moscow, the future of skate videos is taking shape.

Keller has done an amazing job with his latest endeavor. This time around, he teams up with Louie's brother Joey Fountain, and the two of them have assembled a great collection of eyecandy.

Those of you who have never been ter-force. With a budget of approximately nil, and a handful of resources to work with,

Keller and Fountain have created a film that honestly rivals in both content and form the quality of much larger productions.

segment featuring Robby Gaskell for the new ACME skate video, and will also appear in the film. Gaskell makes a spectacular appearance in Capital Seven's movie, along with professional skater Pancho Mulder.

This is a big boost, considering Friends of Salmon didn't feature any professional skaters and much more of the footage was shot in Moscow and the Palouse area. Never Grow Up features local footage as well as scenes shot in Hawaii, where Keller hooked up with Gaskell, Ernie Saldivar and Mulder.

The latest film also focuses much more on skateboarding. Friends of Salmon had shots of skating, rollerblading, BMX freestyle and snowboarding, but Never Grow Up is almost entirely skating with a few snowboarding shots thrown in for good measure.

The tricks in Never Grow Up are not quite as big as in Friends of Salmon. There aren't a plethora of handrail slides or huge airs. That isn't to say the quality of the skating has gone down.

There are a lot of technically amazing sequences, and a lot more long shots where the camera follows a skater around so the audience can see the whole run. The big tricks are there, just not in as huge of proliferation as with Friends of Salmon. The whole thing seems much more casual, and fits with the whole attitude of the film: nothing seems set up.

As Keller said, "The point of the vid isn't for people to go, 'Whoa, those guys are good at skating,' we want people to go, 'Yeah, skating's fun.'"

Louie Fountain, who worked on Friends of Salmon, puts on a stellar performance in Never Grow Up. He slides picnic tables, ollies huge dumpsters, and pulls out some nice old-school stuff you don't see so much anymore. As always, watching Louie skate makes everything seem so simple: Skate, get big air, have fun and you need worry about ribly interested in skateboarding movies have probably already stopped reading by now. But, if for some odd reason you feel compelled by this review, this is really a wonderful introduction to the genre. Capital Seven really captures the essence of the skate video. Never Grow Up is a DIY tour de

You're still skeptical? You've seen the best of the best and how good could a couple of kids from Moscow possibly be? Damn good. During the filming of Never Grow Up, Keller also filmed a nothing else.

And that's really what this movie is about. The audience is attuned to the fact that the filmmakers had a lot of fun doing the movie, and that emotion comes across. There are the requisite "weird people" scenes: the drunk guy who gives Keller advice about sticking that grind "Y'gotta lean back, y'know?" and then "You guys gotta pipe?" on film.

There are also the obligatory police harassment scenes, and these are about on par with any police harassment scene in any skate movie. Cops threatening to take boards away, take skaters to jail, being ignorant in general and throwing around their weight like so much rotten vegetables. I've never seen so many orders to stop filming in any video, and this disturbs me: Why can't you videotape a cop doing his/her job?

In addition to all of this, the non-skating footage is topped off by kids playing with plastic bags.

The music on this soundtrack is impressive, too. The Donners, a local ska/punk band, are the shining stars on the video, their "Dog Song" being representative of not only a prevailing Moscow attitude, but also just a damn catchy diddy that's fun to listen to: "I burned down the kennels when the motherfuckers tried to lock you down." Jetpack and The Chromies also provide accompaniment and set up the perfect DIY ambiance for the video. Jimmy, another local musician, does a great cover of "Talk Dirty to Me" which really just makes the whole thing worth rewinding.

ON-CAMPUS RECRUITING

ASSOCIATE SYSTEMS ENGINEERS
Information Session - Wed., March 26th
Interviews - Fri., March 28th

Looking for a career, not just a job? Fireman's Fund is looking for Associate Systems Engineers who want to solve business challenges, not just apply technology. If you're eager to grow and learn with an industry leader and if you like to take ownership of projects and are driven to pursue excellence, consider a career with Fireman's Fund.

Fireman's Fund leads the insurance industry in applying high technology and state-of-the-art computer systems in every aspect of our business. As an Associate Systems Engineer, you will work at the Home Office in Novato, California, 30 miles north of San Francisco, near California's wine country.

Following a structured, twelve-week training program, you will work within a team environment with Business Analysts and other Systems Engineers to develop automated solutions to complex business problems. Working closely with our business partners, you will see how your work makes a positive contribution to our business goals.

We are seeking bright, energetic people; a BA/BS in MIS or CS is preferred, however we will consider other degrees. We require a 3.0 GPA and two semesters of the same procedural language (C/C++, Lotus Notes, 4GL, COBOL, etc.).

Please join us at the Information Session on Wed., March 26th, at Washington State University in Pullman: Compton Union Building, Room 127 from 5-7pm and/or sign up at your Career Services Center for an interview on Fri., March 28th. Want to find out more about us? Access the Fireman's Fund Home Page at www.the-fund.com.
