Dear Sir:

We understand that you are, among American archaeologists, one who has more years of experience than most; that you have dealt with many types of artifacts from many different sites of differing ages. Thus, you must be fully familiar with what can be called "naturefacts," stones or stone fragments broken by varied natural phenomena. These are often misunderstood and misinterpreted by over enthusiastic, inexperienced, unscientific- one might also say- misguided individuals who claim that these items are man-made.

The result of such unwarranted interpretation is that in both South and North America, the public is being misled into thinking that we have evidence of the presence of human beings at a far earlier age than the true facts indicate.

Even professionals, who should know better, have come under the spell of this misguided thinking, witnessing the recent article by a Mr. C. Vance Haynes Jr. in Science, November 7, 1969, pp. 709-715. Speaking of one location in California which has produced some "naturefacts" and suspected artifacts, he states: "...an age of 500,000 cannot be precluded."

We are not dogmatically taking the position that nothing will be found which is older than the present accepted evidence, but we are concerned with, and hope to stop, the aforementioned, insidious distortions. It is in this connection we seek your help.

Up to now, our efforts have been of little avail for the simple reason that "naturefacts" are worldwide in distribution. Regardless of where found, there are those who take the stand that we are wrong, that these items are actually artifacts, products of the hand of man; that men have been everywhere in the world.

At long last we see the way to set such people straight is by showing them "naturefacts" from a place where only two men have been

-the moon. It has not been publicly mentioned so this is a somewhat premature and confidential reference, but the astronauts now on their way to the moon have been instructed to pick up pieces, i.e. previously broken fragments of rock. These "naturefacts" -or more properly- moonfacts, cannot be distorted by weak minds into proof that men have been there before.

Our point in writing you at this time is to ascertain if you will serve as an advisor. Your duty will be to select, when they become available, those moonfacts which most resemble the "naturefacts" of the earth. You will describe them in terms of the forces which created them, identify the fractures and indicate the direction of the forces creating the fractures. You will do the same for a series of earthly "naturefacts" and a selection, will be supplied by us, of earthly artifacts of impeccable pedigree. These will include some of the misunderstood, primitive stone artifacts of Peru.

If you can accept this assignment, which need not conflict with any other commitments you already have, we are prepared to offer you two hundred dollars a day plus expenses with one provision that your claims not exceed ten thousand in any six-month period. This stipulation is simply to protect our planned project budget.

The Institute of Andean Research, 15 West 77th Street, New York New York 10024 is cooperating in this project by providing us with temporary New York headquarters, so please address me care of them.

Yours sincerely,
