Dear Mrs Crabtree,

I just feel awful when I see that I have been so late to tell you how much I sympathize with you about the incredible blows of fate you suffered recently. I began a letter to you just after the one I wrote, about technical matters, to Don, but I was obliged to let it for a while, and then I had to do some emergency excavations, then to be in different juries for different exams, then again excavations (the bulldozers are turning up a site a week, it seems!). But please believe me when I say that if I am late, I am no less sincere. Having lost my mother and my brother these last years, I understand quite well how it feels. I have not a sufficient knowledge of English to tell you what I really would like to tell.

Denise, of course, joins me in sending you our very very best.

Sincerely,

F. Bordes
