Dear Professor Crabtree:

I have a Ph.D. in sociology and a "supplementary skills" area from my graduate training in anthropology. I teach a general anthropology course, and I have just introduced a course on hunting and gathering societies to be taught in the spring semester. One of the objectives of the course is to instill a sense of appreciation and respect for the hunting and gathering life style. I shall have a lab in which students make their own stone, wood, and bone tools, and then spend three days in the woods surviving with the use of those tools.

I recognize you as the country's foremost authority on flint/stone knapping, and I am writing you too see if you have any suggestions on reading materials or films that explain in some detail the processes of tool construction.

Any assistance you could provide would be appreciated. I thank you, and I look forward to your response.

Sincerely,

Keith E. Campbell
