Dear Mr. Crabtree:

First, let me congratulate you on your outstanding article, "Flaking Stone with Wooden Implements" which appeared in the 10 July 1970 issue of Science. Now let me explain that I am not an anthropologist, but I do have a personal interest in such matters. Your explanation of the techniques of flaking and stone tool fabrication was most lucid.

As you may be able to tell from my address I am stationed in Germany, Wiesbaden to be specific, and do not have access to a library other than the hospital medical library and a rather small lending library on the base. Neither of these subscribe to the journals mentioned in your references. I would sincerely appreciate your sending me any reprints of your articles which you may have in your files. I would like to explore further this business of "flint knapping".

Thank you for a most interesting article, and for the reprints which I hope you may be able to send to me.

Sincerely,

W. K. Douglas
