Dear Don;

I have been wondering how long it will take for us to get our copies of the Science article, so wrote to the Managing Editor (copy enclosed). Meantime we are getting a brisk call for reprints which I'm stockpiling to save postage.

Two, which just came yesterday, are of particular interest so I'm having copies made for myself. Originals to you. The gist is that both Scientific American and some cat who is a science writer on his own want 'more of same' or brief summaries in popularized form. S.A. pays $200.00 for 3,500 words.

Here is what I thought, see how it strikes you: both of us have classes in this or that kind of primitive technology. I have 7 making bone harpoons, musical rasps etc. How about having our students write up their experiments, with a sketch or two apiece (we'll have to edit them very severely) and submit THEIR work for publication?

It would be gorgeous practice for the kids, give them a lot of added incentive, plus they'd get a publication right away in one of the real slicks?

Please let me know right away how you want to handle this?

Very best,
