Dear Dr. Crabtree:

We write to enlist your cooperation in a projected work of reference, the Dictionary of Prehistory, whose scope and method we have attempted to describe in the enclosed prospectus.

If your present commitments permit, we would be most happy if you would undertake to write a definitive article of no more than five thousand words on the subject of TECHNOLOGY OF STONE TOOLS.

The Dictionary, as outlined in the brochure, will include subordinate topics related to the major articles or about material not covered by the major articles. This should enable you to spend more time on conceptual ideas, secure in the knowledge that terminology, site descriptions and the like are cross-referenced and are covered elsewhere in the Dictionary. We are as interested in ideas and theoretical reviews of Prehistory as we are in the precise definition of subject matter. This should permit you considerable scope to express your own ideas.

For an article of five thousand words we offer you a sum of $200. The compensation for shorter articles will be calculated at four cents a word, with the figure rounded off in dollars. We would like to have the manuscript by January 1, 1971.

Should you be willing to undertake this commission, we will send you a formal letter of acceptance, together with specific directions for styling the manuscript. And if you have any queries about matters which the prospectus does not cover, we shall of course be glad to answer them.

Yours truly,

Norman Kotker
