BOOKS from the Wide-Open Spaces

DOCTOR AT TIMBERLINE

by Charles Fox Gardiner, M.D.

A veteran doctor of Colorado who came to the rough Western country in the early eighties to practice among miners, ranch hands, and cattlemen, here tells the fascinating story of his career. Illustrated by R. H. Hall.

8vo, 315 pages, illustrated, $3.00

BLUE STAR

by Corabelle Fellows as told to Kunigunde Duncan

From the crowded drawing rooms of Washington to the lone Dakota prairies of the eighties came Corabelle Fellows to teach Sioux and Cheyenne Indians—and to learn intimately their ways of life.

Large 12mo, 215 pages, illustrated, $2.50

END OF TRACK

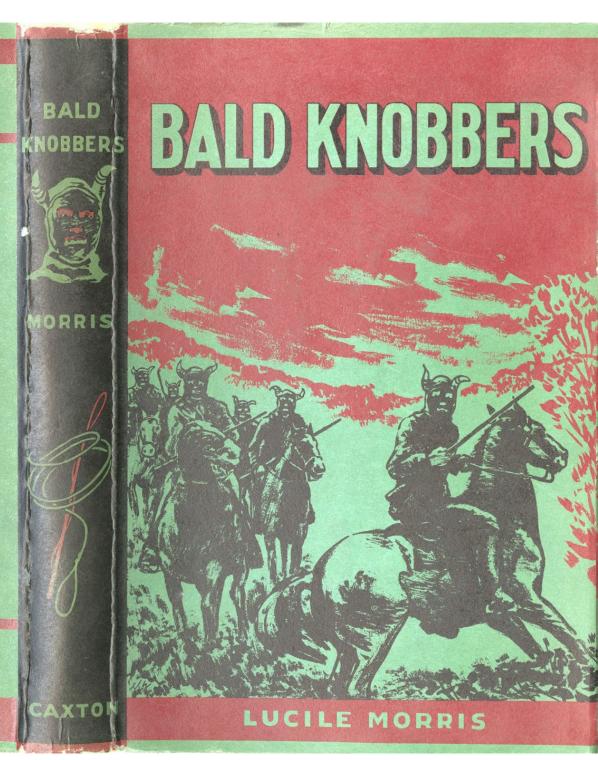

by Hawthorne Daniel

James H. Kyner, intrepid railroad builder and contractor, tells his life story to Hawthorne Daniel. The story of early railroad building in the West.

8vo, 277 pages, illustrated, $3.00

The CAXTON PRINTERS, Ltd., Caldwell, Idaho

Riding through the night, their masks blowing in the wind, their horses' hoofs beating a tattoo of warning to the Ozark hill people who had incited their wrath, the Bald Knobbers were the terror of the Missouri hill country. Beginning as a vigilante organization to wipe out the lawlessness that had long reigned in the region, the Bald Knobbers unfortunately grew into a terroristic group bent on vengeance for petty grievances. The last remnant of the band ended upon the scaffold for the perpetration of a cowardly and bloody crime, and the ultimate break-up of the organization marked the end of rule by violence in the Ozark area.

Mention of the Bald Knobbers is still a subject of argument among many denizens of the Ozarks. So confused is the story of the organization that it took many months for Lucile Morris to construct the true history of the night riders from the mass of evidence she had gathered. Old newspaper files were scoured, dozens of old-timers interviewed, all books on the subject weighed for their authenticity, and court records perused. From this great collection of information Lucile Morris has written an account well documented-yet as exciting as an adventure story for its sheer drama and human interest.